In the first meet of the trip, UMass scored one of its best team scores of the year, but the 193.150 was not enough to topple a tough team from Stanford, which recorded a 197.275.

Junior Mandy Mosby led the Minutewomen with a season high 38.925 in the all–around, including a 9.875 on the floor exercise. Seniors Anita Sanyal and Jennifer Pokrana performed well on the balance beam notching a 9.875 and a 9.850, respectively.

Sophomore Jill Fisher scored a 9.775 on the vault leading the Maroon and White with a score of 48.525, their highest team vault rate of the season. Sophomore Kyla Palombini tumbled her way to a 9.800 on the floor exercise and tied teammate Michelle LoPresti with a 9.750 on the balance beam.

But the Minutewomen could not withstand the Cardinal, which recorded three perfect 10s on three different events and were less than three points away from a perfect score.

The UMass squad traveled next to Sacramento to face Cal State–Sacramento. The Minutewomen dropped a close meet, losing by only .075 (192.900–192.975), to fall to 9–6 on the year.

Freshman Tracy Chew won the all–around with a score of 38.550 with Mosby claiming second in the event with a 37.775. Chew set new career–highs on three events, placing third on the vault and fourth on the balance beam. Her performance earned her Atlantic 10 women's gymnastic Rookie of the Week honors. Mosby took fifth on both the floor exercise and the balance beam apparatus.

Palombini tied Mosby on the floor and also tied Sanyal for first on the balance beam. Sanyal chipped in with a second– place finish on the uneven bars. Fisher once again asserted herself on the vault with a second–place finish and also delivered a second–place performance on the floor exercise.

The California road trip concludes the regular season for the Minutewomen. They will return to action on Saturday, March 27 when they travel to Philadelphia for the 1999 Atlantic 10 women's gymnastics championships.

Miami.

Calipari's run had come to an end, and he knew it right there and then. But it wasn't even so much the 3–17 start this year that was his greatest downfall.

The bottom line is that he had burned too many bridges along the way this time around. He had disputes with the fans, the media, the players such as Williams and Kendall Gill, with Rowe and perhaps most importantly, with second– year owner Katz.

The previous ownership, a group of business men known affectionately as the "Secaucus Seven," took a laissez–faire approach to their team, and were content to let Cal call the shots.

Katz came to Jersey with an agenda, that involves moving the club to Newark, but certainly did not include the likes of Calipari, whose act wore thin with him quickly.

Without any legitimate allies in the end, Cal's fate was sealed. But he will land on his feet, as he always seems to do. For one thing, he has $7.5 million coming his way as part of the buyout of his contract.

For another, there will be colleges banging down his door, if they have not already. Almost any athletic director would be willing to take the chance that he can build their program from scratch as he did in Amherst.

Or he may even coach this team you've heard of from Kansas. If Roy Williams does indeed secure the North Carolina position if it so happens to become available.

No matter what transpires though, Katz may eventually regret the decision to give up so quickly on Cal, at least in regards to what happens on the court.

It appears to be logical that the coach should have at least have been given the opportunity to right the ship once again, with the assistance of Marbury, the playmaker the team was sorely lacking all along.

Calipari will take all of the invaluable experience that he gained in his short stay in the NBA to his next endeavor, only next time he may look to make some more friends along the way.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Discipline and patience are your best friends today, as you play the "waiting game" while someone else provides you with the best possible environment.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Follow the course you've established for yourself, and avoid any major side trips. However, one late in the day will probably be worth your time.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — What sounds most attractive to you deserves the most suspicion and scrutiny. Is it really all that it's cracked up to be? Be wary of things that sound too good to be true.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — The time for jokes has passed, and you must be willing to bear current responsibilities with the seriousness others know you possess.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You are waiting for news of someone else's success or failure before you set the wheels for your own project in motion today. Be prepared to go either way.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You can demand that what you're feeling is legitimate, but the fact is that what is fair is fair. You may not be on solid ground here.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be feeling a little "out of touch" today, even after a positive and memorable week. Be more free with thoughts and ideas.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You're likely to find that you have something important in common with someone you've just met, but it's not going to be what you think!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — A chance encounter may get you involved in suspicious affairs before the day is out. Keep your wits about you, and be observant and objective.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Don't take too much time with preliminaries today. Save your energy for one or two issues that will demand more focus and dedication.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — No more unpleasant surprises for you today. You can expect things to go very much you own way, at least for the time being.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — The changes you are making at this time are attributable in part to someone who is still lurking in the background. Bring him or her to the forefront.

UMass to host Friars

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team will look to continue its winning ways this afternoon when it hosts Providence College in a scheduled 2:30 p.m. first pitch at Earl Lorden Field.

After dropping six straight to open the season, the Minutemen have since won five consecutive games heading into today's matchup with the Friars. UMass will look to get back to the .500 mark against PC, which is arguably the hottest New England team at the moment.

Senior captain Brian Samela will call the plays from behind the plate this year for the Massachusetts baseball team.

Winners of 12 in a row, the Friars will arrive in Amherst to play the Minutemen in a one of their final tuneups before opening up Big East conference action this weekend. The Minutemen have been on a roll offensively in their last five wins, scoring at least 10 runs in every contest. In its most recent contest on Saturday, UMass thumped Central Connecticut, 17-0.

Senior Aaron Braunstein

Senior captain Seth Kaplan

Senior Brian Mazzaferro

Individually, the Minutemen have been led by freshman catcher/designated hitter Chris Morgan, who is batting .417 on the young season. Fellow starters Nate Lang, Scott Anderson, Bryan Mazzaferro, Aaron Bruanstein and Steve Asadoorian are all over the .300 mark for UMass.

An array of young hurlers have stepped up recently to complement junior Travis Veracka and senior co-captain Bill Cooke. Sophomores Craig Szado and David Loonie each earned wins last week, along with junior Todd Samolewicz, a transfer from North Adams State.

The Friars, who bring a 19-3 record into today's game, haven't lost since dropping a 7-6 decision to Florida International on March 3. Today's game will also mark the final meeting between these two schools on the diamond, as the Friars are dropping their baseball program following this season.

For now, however, Providence is trying to make the most on this final season. Offensively, PC is led by sophomore outfielder Mike Scott, who sports a team-leading .444 average with 22 RBI. Junior outfielder Keith Reed is right behind Scott with a .441 average, as well as a team-leading seven home runs and 32 RBI.

Other top starters include first baseman Mike O'Keefe (.383 average, five homers), shortstop Jamie Athas (.357 average) and catcher Dan Conway (.356 average).

Senior leadership has been the key for the Friars so far this season. Righty Rob Corraro has posted a perfect 5-0 record thus far, while Marc DesRoches has also been impressive, as evident by a 4-1 mark and a 2.15 earned run average. Josh Burnham is also a perfect 4-0 to go along with a 3.08 ERA.

After today's home opener, the Minutemen will take to the field tomorrow afternoon when they will travel to Worcester to take on the Crusaders of Holy Cross.

Skiers strike gold at California Nationals

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

In terms of sheer white-knuckled excitement, you could not have written a more dramatic story than the one that unfolded at the United States College Ski Association Nationals the weekend of March 12.

Racers from all over the country descended upon California's Mammoth Mountain Ski Area for the biggest meet of the season, an end-all-be-all race to determine the nation's fastest and best. And by the time the skis stopped, the five qualifiers from the Massachusetts ski team had more than left their mark on the season's most competitive field.

The Minutemen were led, as usual, by two sensational performances from senior All-American Thomas Holden. The Lincoln native put the finishing touches on a brilliant college career with a 10th-place run in the giant slalom, in a time of 2:03.07. Earlier in the meet, Holden captured a 14th-place finish in the slalom in 1:43.09, six seconds off the lead.

Holden's showing helped garner an eighth-place team finish for UMass, as well as USCSA All-American honors for the captain. This was the fourth-straight nationals in which Holden was so honored, making it a truly remarkable feat.

"Thomas has been our spark plug all season," said teammate Ken Thoman. "His focus has helped us all keep our eyes on the prize."

All-American Tom Holden

Sierra Nevada College took home the overall team title, with SNC's Uros Pavlovic handily besting the field in both events. St. Olaf, Ft. Lewis, Whitman and Plymouth State rounded out the top five schools by team finish, while Colby/Sawyer, Rocky Mountain College, UMass, Lees McRae and Albertson comprised the rest of the top 10.

Two of the Maroon and White's biggest surprises of the season continued to turn heads at Mammoth, as Thoman and fellow freshman Rich Granger put the wraps on sensational rookie campaigns. Thoman, a native of New York, blazed to a 28th-place run in the slalom (1:51.33) before pounding out a 33rd-place finish in the GS in 2:08.14.

Princeton, N.J. native Granger showed poise that belied his youth with a 43rd showing in the slalom in 1:54.35.

"The competition level at Nationals is just intense, period," said Granger. "These guys are the biggest and best of college skiing."

The multi-sport athlete will now begin his off-season training regime with hopes of walking onto the UMass football team this fall.

Two other Massachusetts natives put up hot numbers for UMass at Mammoth, as Ashburnham's Christian Guertin and Westfield's Mike Hadden continued to display the competitive fire that will make them key leaders on next year's team.

Guertin concluded a marvelous season by placing 51st and 63rd, respectively, in the GS and slalom. The junior transfer from Norwich was arguably UMass' most consistent skier in '99, finishing in 15 of 16 races on the year.

Sophomore Hadden rebounded from a sub-par outing at last month's NCAA Regionals to place 52nd in the slalom (1:57.40) and 69th in the GS (2:14.97).

"With such a young team, it's important for the older guys to step it up," said Holden. "This is certainly a sport where experience pays off."

UM women's water polo challenges nation's best

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The No. 7 Massachusetts women's water polo team (13-4) had quite the week. Although they went 6-4 overall, and 2-4 on their all important West Coast road trip to California, the Minutewomen finished the week strong when they swept the competition at the Massachusetts Women's Water Polo Invitational Tournament.

The Minutewomen began the week on a good note when they took No. 14 UC-San Diego to double overtime before winning on a goal by All-American Katie Grogan with 31 seconds remaining in the second overtime. Grogan led the team, collecting two goals on the night.

UMass played on March 14 against No. 5 San Diego State. Junior co-captain Claudia Clement scored three goals, but it wasn't enough to defeat the high powered Aztecs, who outscored the Minutewomen 5-1 in the final frame to finish off the 10-5 win.

UMass continued its matchups against ranked opponents when it faced No. 18 Pacific. Grogan chipped in her fourth and fifth goals of the trip to provide most of the offense for the Minutewomen, who dropped a tough contest by a score of 8-4.

Rebounding the very next day, the Minutewomen defeated No. 12 Long Beach State 7-5 on the strength of 14 saves by freshman goalie Dana Sinkwich. Offensively, it was Clements' turn to provide the punch, as she scored four goals in the contest.

Only hours after downing LBS, the Minutewomen had to refocus and play No. 4 UCLA, their toughest competition of the tournament. Clement and Grogan each scored a goal and the Minutewomen put together a solid defensive effort but fell to one of the top programs in the nation, 6-2.

"We were winning after the first quarter of the UCLA game and were down one at the half," UMass coach Dan McOsker said. "I think now they believe they can win those games. They just need to learn that we have to finish every play and every game against those teams."

Finally, the Minutewomen wrapped up their trip out west with a matchup against No. 9 UC-Santa Barbara, which UMass played to a 4-4 tie after three quarters. The Banana Slugs finished off UMass with 5:41 remaining when Kelly Tiffany netted the game-winner.

Although the Minutewomen dropped four of six in California, they had many reasons to be positive about the next bout of competition.

"It was a great trip. It gave us a chance to see where we are at on the national level, and we found out that we can beat any team in the country," McOsker said of the trip.

The Minutewomen translated many of the positives from the trip into their first home tournament of the season, as they went 4-0 in at the UMass Invitational.

Claudia Clement came up big for the UMass women's water polo team over Spring Break.

The tournament started on Saturday with a 9-2 win over Dartmouth. Freshman Alexa Olsen tallied three goals. The Minutewomen then used a pair of hat-trick performances by Anne Dettloff and Megan Perry to soundly defeat Wesleyan, 11-4.

The third match of the day was against Brown, which provided another opportunity for the Minutewomen to practice the offense. Grogan scored five goals, while Dettloff tacked on another three to give the Minutewomen a 15-4 win over the Bears. Marci Hupp tallied a pair of goals in the contest.

Sunday's date with Mount Holyoke was another scoring fest for the Minutewomen. Nine different UMass players scored to up-end the Lady Lyons, 14-3. Katie Mayer and Megan Thompson each scored three goals, while Dettloff scored another pair of goals.

Calipari meets his match with Nets

Former UMass men's basketball coach John Calipari will seek new opportunities now that his stint with the New Jersey Nets has been terminated.

Katz pulls plug on master plan of former UMass b-ball coach

Sanford Appell

Last week, the New Jersey Nets bid adieu to old friend John Calipari in the midst of his third season as coach and vice president of basketball operations.

The man who refused to lose for eight years at the University of Massachusetts helm, compiled a 72-112 record in the Swamp after the Nets brass gave him virtually free reign to reverse almost 20 years of misfortune.

And entering this season, Calipari had made the most of that opportunity. After a tumultuous opening campaign when the Nets finished 26-56, Calipari began to make major strides in what he envisioned to be a five-year rebuilding program, much like the one he implemented at UMass.

Calipari opened more than a few eyes midway through that first season when he orchestrated a monumental deal with Dallas which unloaded stiff Shawn Bradley, effective but injury-prone Robert Pack, and turnover-happy Khalid Reeves and somehow brought back Jim Jackson, Sam Cassell, Chris Gatling, George McCloud and Eric Montross.

Suddenly people were talking about the Nets, as evidenced by a sellout crowd for a Tuesday night game against Miami to welcome the stars shipped over from the Lone Star State.

The team did not improve much the rest of that season, but the fact that Calipari had taken such initiative helped prove to upper management that he was committed to making the team better in the coming years.

Calipari somehow topped his initial act by making a swap that would have even more impact than the steal from Dallas.

After drafting Tim Thoman with the seventh pick in the 1997 draft, he packaged the Villanova product with Jackson to land the second pick in that draft, future superstar Keith Van Horn from Philadelphia.

Now things were progressing faster than even "Trader Cal" could imagine. Midway through his second season, a playoff berth was becoming a likely possibility.

The newfound success was not enough for the fiery coach, as he somehow disposed of unwanted Yinka Dare and a hobbled David Benoit and brought Rony Seikaly over to Jersey for insurance in the post.

The going became so good on the court that Cal was able to mend the fences (at least publicly) with All-Star center Jayson Williams, who had written a disparaging piece on him in GQ Magazine. But relations inside the organization were breaking down for the coach despite the improved record.

Nonetheless, Cal carried on and led the Nets to their first playoff appearance since the Chuck Daly/Derrick Coleman era which must have seemed like several eternities ago to Net supporters who suffered through the Butch Beard years.

Taking away from the tremendous accomplishment was the fact that the team backed into the playoffs, losing all but one of their final four games to sneak into the eighth and final spot, as they defeated a lame-duck Detroit team on the final day of the '97-98 season.

However, Calipari reaffirmed to his supporters that his program was for real, as the Nets valiantly battled the world champion Chicago Bulls to the death in the first two games of their series in the Windy City.

The Nets ran out of gas in the third game, but Cal hadn't.

He had changed the culture of the organization, which was in itself more than could be expected out of anyone coaching this franchise, and now he was ready to take the team to the next level.

Backing up Calipari's impact was a cover of Slam Magazine toward the end of last season with a headline that read "Nets: Champs by 2000"— finally something for the Net owners to bring home to their grandkids!

While even Cal may have gasped at that, another playoff spot, even an Atlantic Division title, seemed fairly realistic.

After the lengthy owner-imposed lockout delayed this season, the Nets stumbled out of the gate, as the team was hammered with injuries to Seikaly, Kerry Kittles and most importantly, starting point guard Cassell.

Cassell was injured on the first weekend of the season, and returned for only one game against the Knicks in February.

That would be the last time Cassell, one of the few player supporters of Cal, would don a Nets uniform, as he was swapped in the Stephon Marbury deal on March 11.

Only this deal wasn't the work of the man who supposedly had control of basketball operations.

Principal owner Lewis Katz pulled the trigger on the three-team deal that brought Marbury, a Brooklyn native, to the other side of the Hudson River.

The Nets were 5-16 at the time of the trade, and Cassell had given no indication of returning anytime soon, so clearly something had to be done, but Calipari had no intention of making Cassell the fall guy.

Rumblings of an imminent firing of Calipari began to surface in the New York tabloids. No one was willing to confirm or deny the rumors, as a more likely scenario had Cal picking up the option on an out-clause at the end of the season in a more graceful fashion.

After the Nets were thumped by Miami on March 14 on national television in Marbury's N.J. debut, there were security guards waiting at the foot of the team bus.

Calipari was denied admittance to join his club, and was instead informed that Katz and Team President Michael Rowe would meet him for dinner that evening in

Student Government Assoc. elections begin

Six candidates run for student presidency amid admissions policy debate

Jim Eltringham, a sophomore journalism major, is no newcomer to Student Government Association politics.

"I've worked with the student government on many levels but I wanted to do this because of my work with the house council. I was vice president of Coolidge house council and this year I am president.

"House council is officially not defined in the student government," said Eltringham. "But it's like the government on a building wide scale. every cluster has one."

Eltringham is currently serving his second year as senator representing Coolidge Residential Hall.

"I have working knowledge of the Constitution and I deal with it on a daily basis, but from working on house council I have recognized the value of tireless work ethic, when Ien Braun was president and I workad under her. We opened up a snack bar. We need active house councils. If you put your nose to the grindstone things can get

Jeffrey Howe, a junior political science major, has served as a senator from Orchard Hill Residential Area for two years and this year he is the area governor of Orchard Hill.

In addition, Howe is also the coordinator for the judicial advisors program for the dean of students and this is what has really prepared him to run for the Student Government Association presidency.

"I am the only student on the student affairs judicial issues committee. We create and review housing policy," said Howe.

Howe feels his experience on the committee has given him beneficial insight into student affairs.

"I feel that through judicial advising I have met a lot of students and have learned what their needs are," said Howe.

Howe, sticking with what he know best, wants to revamp the student justice system. "The university needs to restructure the judicial system. Students charged with a crime should

Junior finance major Robert Murray is a newcomer to the Student Government Association who feels he can make a difference in many students' lives by running for the presidential candidacy. According to Murray, he possesses leadership qualities that may not be political but that show he is capable of doing a good job.

Murray has played two college sports. Before transferring to the University of Massachusetts, Murray played hockey at Assumption College, here on the UMass campus he plays with the varsity lacrosse.

"I have a strong work ethic with leadership skills. I have commitment and dedication. I can do anything in regard to making a change at this school," said Murray.

Murray is running because he believes if he can make the lives of the UMass students just a little better than it would be worth it.

"I want to make changes that will directly effect the lives of students. An example is stopping exams on

The fact that Brian Palmucci is a student at the University of Massachusetts was reason enough to make him decide to run for president of the Student Government Association. Palmucci, a junior political science major said, "The fact that I am a student makes me experienced enough to run."

Other than Palmucci's experience as a student he did serve as senator for a semester, but according to Palmucci he had to resign because of scheduling conflicts. "I have knowledge of how they [SGA] do things and I disagree with it. The SGA is filled with smart energetic people but they don't get things done. I think they need stronger leadership."

After citing an article from The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Palmucci went on to give an explanation for the behavior in senate meetings. "When there was a debate about affirmative action it ended in curses and people didn't even vote. They were frustrated. I thinks it's a

Bron Tamulis, a junior English and social thought and political economy major, is running for president of the Student Government Association based on his belief that continuation from one year to the next is an important part of the SGA's success.

"I am the only candidate running who participated in the cabinet last year and I can see myself following through on things [that have been started]."

Tamulis was a senator at large for Central Residential Area for two years and this year was appointed to his current position as secretary of public relations in the cabinet. He has been working with the executive cabinet branch for over a year now and feels he can "definitely understand the processes and the people that are involved in the process."

Tamulis is interested in exploring issues such as parking on campus, "I want to get students up here during

Michael Whitehouse, an undeclared freshman, who has gained support from the Cannabis Reform Coalition, is looking to become the new president of the Student Government Association.

Whitehouse, who has had only limited experience at University of Massachusetts, is no stranger to politics in other aspects.

"I have some exposure to the SGA senate. I have followed their activities for quite a while. I have been involved with many campaigns, [including] lobbying for bills regarding education," said Whitehouse.

As for previous experience, Whitehouse said — "I was an officer of the group called Student Advisors Council in high school. It is a state funded organization."

Whitehouse says he can see the SGA as a positive power at UMass if the leaders are capable. "I see potential for power in the SGA but they

Four students run for student trustee position

Seth Avakian, senior political science major, has been involved in the Student Government Association for three and a half years. Avakian plans to attend graduate school at the University of Massachusetts and wants to continue to be involved with the SGA, which has lead him to run for the position of student trustee.

Currently, Avakian is both a senator who represents commuter students and a judicial advisor for the SGA. In the past, he has held positions on residential committees and served as the chair of the Ways and Means Committee.

Avakian feels he has done a good job so far and desires to provide continuous service to the UMass community.

"I feel I've done a lot of good on campus and being a trustee would empower me to do more. I've seen

Adam DeCruz, a senior political science major, running for Student Government Association student trustee has been working with large groups as the University of Massachusetts for a quite a while and is now prepared to take on even more responsibility.

Last semester DeCruz was a senator for commuters and this semester he is the Inner Fraternity Council president.

"I have experience working with large groups of people. I have a good feel for representing large groups of people. I can understand their needs," said DeCruz.

Now that DeCruz is spending a fifth year at UMass he said he has the time to be a good trustee which was always on his agenda.

"I wanted to finish my major, I did and now I have time to do this. A lot can be accomplished not just within Gregory Ng, an undeclared freshman, is looking to move on from his position as a senator to become the Student Government Association student trustee. Other than representing the Northeast Residential Area, Ng has participated in a plethora of activities that he feels has prepared him to take on a new challenge.

"Here on campus, I've sat on the vice chancellor's Summit for Safety Committee, and I am on the Ways and Means Committee. Also I'm on the Amherst task force for alcohol — we set the town alcohol policy."

Like many of the other candidates, Ng is concerned with how useful the SGA has been to the students in the past and has posed that as his main issue. He feels it is important to make the SGA more responsive to the students of the UMass campus.

"The SGA needs to be more

Malika Tafawa, a junior management and economics major, has experience not just with the Student Government Association but with a number of student organizations.

Tafawa was a senator for a year and a half representing Northeast Residential Area at-large, and is a member of the African Association, the Black Student Union and the Asian Latino African Native American (ALANA) organization. In addition, Tafawa also served as chair for the ALANA caucus. Currently she is the activities coordinator for the Black Student Union.

Tafawa says she has decided to run because, "I feel I am the best candidate for the position. There are issues that can only be dealt with on a trustee level and those

Task force's deadline lost on administration

By Jill Carroll

A secret vote was taken during an organizational meeting of students and faculty last night to decide what action, if any, to take today after the University of Massachusetts administration left the most recent affirmative action policy unchanged by 5 p.m. yesterday.

Student leaders, of a task force for upholding the prior UMass admissions policy, gave the University administration an ultimatum before Spring Break to either call a moratorium on the current affirmative action policy or face the consequences.

Chancellor David K. Scott sent a letter Monday addressed to all students outlining what is currently done to increase the diversity of the student body.

"We are in great sympathy with the desire some students have expressed to call a moratorium. Unfortunately, this is not possible," wrote Scott.

But those attending last night's meeting said the letter was not the response they called for.

"In that letter he said absolutely nothing," said Kiya Stokes a graduate student and member of the steering committee of the task force of students addressing the issue. "[Today] we have to make a serious statement."

Any action, ranging in suggestions from none to taking over the Whitmore Administration building, will be a closely guarded secret until today's noon rally on the Student Union steps. The students and faculty from UMass and the other four colleges wanted to have the element of surprise on their side to avoid administrators taking preventative measures.

After compiling a list of over 20 suggested actions including a silent march through academic buildings, stopping traffic or doing nothing to make administrators nervous, participants at the meeting each voted for four actions they wanted taken.

Members of the steering committee, tallied the votes last night and will be taking whatever action received the most votes.

"I feel like the campus is going to unite [around this issue]," said Hamilton Rodrigues, a junior communications major who attended the meeting.

But Scott was also attending meetings to address the affirmative action issue yesterday. He met with several individuals yesterday afternoon including Student Government President Salwa Shamapande.

Shamapande said his meeting with Scott and others was informative for both sides and suggestions were made about what to do about the policy but nothing substantive was decided.

But Shamapande, who could only attend part of the organizational meeting due to his meeting with Scott, had some advice for students looking to take action today.

"If you're right you can never

Trial involving UMass shooting delayed to review case evidence

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Jurors in Northampton Superior Court were sent home early yesterday as the trial of Sokha Chhim, the 18-year-old Amherst man accused of shooting former University of Massachusetts student Russell Bishop, was delayed until Thursday.

Judge Judd Carhart dismissed the jury after lengthy private bench discussions with defendant lawyer Joseph A. Franco and Assistant District Attorney David Ross.

Neither attorney would comment on the reason for the postponement, but a courtroom source said the delay was granted to allow the defense to review new evidence.

Prior to the delay, Carhart denied a motion filed by the defense to suppress witness testimony involving suspect identification.

In the motion, the defense wrote that the procedure of photographic arrays by which Chhim was identified was "inherently suggestive," and requested that the evidence be excluded from the trial.

Citing a 1980 Massachusetts court case, Commonwealth v. Correia, the defense argued that the photographic arrays were "so unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to mistaken identification as to deny the defendant due process of law."

"The emphasis when properly assembling photo arrays should be on the description given by the witnesses," the motion stated.

Each of the eight witnesses described the assailant as Hispanic, the motion further states. "Notwithstanding, the police began abandoning the witnesses' descriptions and presenting photo arrays with Asian-looking pictures."

Ross submitted a memorandum rebuffing the defense's arguments. He argued that "there was never uniformity among the witnesses as to whether the person was Hispanic" and that "Asian-looking males were included only after the police received information from a citizen informant."

"The decision to broaden the inquiry was reasonable," the memorandum continued.

In addition, Ross noted that Bishop had said the name of the person who shot him was either "Sokha" or "Sokout," and that Chhim had been seen several days earlier with a gun similar to the one used to shoot Bishop.

The motion was presented Monday before jury selection. Judge Carhart considered the motion overnight, and denied the motion to suppress.

The opening statements scheduled for yesterday will be heard on Thursday. Bishop will be the state's first witness.

Debate puts issues on the table

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association presidential and student trustee candidate debates were held last night.

The debate featured statements from each of the 10 candidates for student government president and trustee. Candidates were questioned by a three-person panel of representatives from UVC (Channel 19), WMUA, and the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

Presidential candidates include: Jim Eltringham, Jeffrey Howe, Robert Murray, Brian Palmucci, Bron Tomulis and Michael Whitehouse.

Whitehouse said he believed two elements essential to an effective student government are communication and leadership and discussed the issue of student privatization. He said he would "not allow student businesses to be pushed aside... when the administration gets greedy."

Howe emphasized his experience in the SGA, area government and on University-wide committees, stating that "the person elected has to have avenues of communication [with the administration] already established" in order to be effective.

Tomulis stressed the need to involve students more directly in the decision-making process, and suggested hiring students to review parking services. "Let's have real answers and real research."

Eltringham described himself as an "optimist" who loves the University and wants to see it become "the best it can be." He said he plans to empower house councils and educate students about the role of the SGA.

Palmucci expressed his dissatisfaction with the current SGA that he feels "disenfranchises students." He described his role as president as a "mouthpiece for students," and vowed to represent all student viewpoints.

In his opening statement, student athlete Murray vowed to bring his dedication on the athletic fields to the student government. He was not present for the question-and-answer period.

The candidates for trustee include: Seth Avakian, Adam DeCruz, Greg Ng, Malika Tafawa.

Avakian said he plans to increase student respect both on and off campus among UMass staff, administration, the Board of Trustees and the town. He also plans to bring the trustees to campus regularly to meet students.

Tawafa emphasized that "it's more than just my gender and race that make me stand out as a candidate." She said her ability to provide outreach to the University community is a "priceless asset."

Ng stressed communication as a major part of his platform and his desire to make the student government more responsive to students. "I truly feel student involvement is key to our success."

Adam DeCruz described himself as a goal-driven individual. "Every goal I've set for myself I've accomplished," he said. "I'm very proud of what I've done. I won't stop until they [the administration and Board of Trustees] hear what we have to say."

responsive to the students. Currently I feel it's not working at its capacity. They hold a laissez faire attitude, if you will. I do not feel like SGA is working.

"It needs to be run more like a business rather than a bureaucracy. This will undoubtably make the SGA more responsive and accessible to the students" Ng said.

To achieve this, Ng says he would be in direct contact with the students as a method of better understanding what the students really expect out of the SGA.

"We would have a unique opportunity to insure that all perspectives are represented and explored," said Ng.

Other than being in direct contact with the students, Ng says he has already sat down with Governor Paul Cellucci to discuss the issues that will make him more prepared for the position.

As for affirmative action, Ng sees it as a hard spot without easy answers.

"The affirmative action issue was prompted by Boston Latin. Chancellor Scott was forced to change to the policy. Race-based affirmative action is illegal based on the Boston Latin decision."

"The University of Michigan is being sued because they willingly set forth a policy based on race and the chancellor is being sued as well," Ng said.

Ng hopes there will be an increase in voters over the next two days as compared to years in the past in which voter turn-out was low.

"I hope to bring in more than five percent of the students involvement. I hope more students will become involved with the SGA. I can't do it alone and students voices could strengthen through the SGA." said Ng.

are the ones I plan to take on."

Academic support programs is just one of the issues Tafawa plans to tackle. "I want to strengthen the bilingual collegiate programs, the native program and the United Asian Resource Center."

According to Tawafa, the freshmen class of ALANA students fell by 35 percent because of the students' low rate of return after their first year at the University. "We need retention, and we will get that through the learning support programs."

How the money is divided and where it comes from is what Tawafa sees as a contributing factor to the problem. Some of the programs, according to Tawafa, are run by the administration and others are run by students, depending on where the money comes from. However, "a joint budget put in the hands of the students would restore [the programs] for the students. The Career Advising Center is not enough for the students," said Tafawa.

In order to get her plans moving Tafawa feels "research needs to be done on why the [administration] runs [some programs] and what the effect will be if all programs are run by students."

As for the current admissions policy, Tawafa's membership on the task force for education run by the ALANA Affairs Office has given her a strong opinion.

"Administration should hold off and give students a chance to be a part of the decision that is made. A student trustee is crucial in this, important input could be lost without a trustee," said Tafawa.

Tafawa wants students to get involved and expect more from their student trustee. "I want to encourage students to demand that their trustee be pro-active to students needs," said Tawafa.

~News Brief~

Edgar Bronfman and Richard Joel, two prominent contributors to Jewish life on campus initiatives, will visit the University of Massachusetts campus this afternoon.

Bronfman and Joel will speak with Jewish campus leaders and other Jewish students in a Town Meeting forum at 3:30 p.m. in the Hillel House main lounge.

Bronfman, head of Seagram Company, Ltd., is the chairman of the International Board of Governors of Hillel. The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life. He is also the President of the World Jewish Congress, working to foster Jewish unity worldwide, and the World Jewish Restitution Organization, providing Holocaust survivors and their families with due compensation for the misappropriation of their goods during World War II.

Joel is the president and international director of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, and speaks frequently with students on the role college campuses play in creating a "Jewish renaissance."

Please contact UMass Hillel, at 545-1710, for more information regarding this event.

Scott met again in the evening with unspecified individuals about affirmative action. The content of the later meeting was not available at the time of press and Scott did not return several calls for comment yesterday afternoon due to the meetings.

UMass President William M. Bulger could not be reached for comment after several calls to his office yesterday afternoon.

TAX ADVANTAGED SOLUTIONS FROM TIAA-CREF

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can avoid with SRAs—tax-deferred annuities from TIAA-CREF. SRAs not only ease your current tax bite, they offer an easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in pretax dollars, you pay less in taxes now. And since earnings on your SRAs are tax deferred, your money works even harder for you.

Today, we offer other before- and after-tax financial solutions, including IRAs and mutual funds. They're backed by the same investment expertise, low expenses, and personal service that have made TIAA-CREF the choice of America's educational and research community.

For Eltringham, it was a tough decision to decide to run. "They [house council members] posed the question saying that if I pursued this position I could help more people rather than 550 people who live in Coolidge. When they put it that way I knew it was something I wanted to do."

Although Eltringham, like the rest of the candidates, is hoping to prevail, he feels he is no different than anyone else in one respect.

"Everyone is running because they think they can make a difference, I am no different."

Eltrimham is interested in getting paper towels put in the dorm bathrooms. According to Eltringham, Patterson Residential Hall and Mackimmie Residential Hall have paper towels in their bathrooms because house councils worked for it.

"What the SCA needs to realize is that all politics start local," said Eltringham.

He also intends to get more support for student businesses. "The Center for Student Business gave us advice on our snack bar but couldn't do much else because their resources were tapped. It one of those things that are falling through the cracks."

According to Eltringham, viewpoints on affirmative action have been coming from every direction. "The University did this to prevent a lawsuit. Not only can the school be sued but the Chancellor can be too. We can't bring affirmative action back, but on the flip side, it is a dangerous to discount the fact that there are disadvantaged people out there. We can't use race, it's a legal issue but we can use income. Something needs to happen soon because right now we have no policy."

be able to have someone represent them.

Now they represent themselves even if the issue is serious like a failing grade in a class that you've worked hard in all semester or housing removal," said Howe.

Privacy in dorms is another issue that Howe says he will fight for. He wants to see the privacy of student's dorms respected and the police made to follow Fourth Amendment rights.

Asian Latino African Native American enrollment is also something that Howe feels strongly about. "The university must live up to it's promises so we can guarantee 20 percent ALANA student on our campus," said Howe. He then referred to Senator Seth Avakian's motion to place a moratorium and look for alternate procedures.

"This is a viable option right now, it will help us maintain diversity here next year and then we can look into a new admissions policy which may or may not include socio- economic background," said Howe.

Howe urges students to "look at the cards and let the records speak for themselves."

Citing the importance of a vocal SGA, Howe encourages students to take an interest in the election and look for the candidates who have the ability to represent many student interests.

"SGA needs to be supported by people who speak up. Students should vote for the student leadership that best fits the school as a whole and not just one political affiliation," said Howe.

■ Murray

Saturdays, these are things that will effect everyday life.

One of Murray's primary issues for the presidency concerns parking. "I want to increase parking, and make it more convenient. I also want to decrease the amount of cars that get towed," said Murray.

Murray would also like to make Sports network ESPN more accessible in all the dorms. Murray is also committed to changing the drinking laws on campus. "I want to make drinking on campus more lenient, this will decrease the amount of people going out and drinking off- campus. There are no cabs here by drinking on campus there would possibly be less DWI's given out and fatalities," said Murray.

Murray says he would take this through senate and "go all out to take action through the senate, "then he would play it by ear and see what happens and we could have a walkout if it doesn't pass."

Transportation is another issue on Murray's list of priorities for the presidency. According to Murray, students do not like to park at the yellow lot in Southwest Residential Area because it is far from the dorms. "I want to have a shuttle running every half and hour from there and then students would feel better about parking there." said Murray.

"I hope I prevail. I am dedicated to making changes for this school, I haven't seen so much getting done and I would like to turn it around to make UMass a better environment for students," said Murray.

how strong leadership can benefit students and the problems that arise in its absence."

One of Avakian's main goals is to make the administration stick to it's promises. The first promise he intends to hold administration to is their goal to raise the enrollment of Asian Latino African Native American (ALANA) students by twenty percent.

Avakian also said he was committed to keeping tuition and fees low, putting more ATM's in the Campus Center as well as putting some in Southwest. Avakian also wants to investigate the possibility of helping student athletes receive credit for participating in a varsity sport.

Avakian said he would fight for the students' Fourth Amendment rights. "I've heard lots of problems with that [violations of Fourth Amendment rights] lately as a judicial advisor."

"Students have been saying that police are entering rooms without consent or warning and I heard that police are misrepresenting themselves," Avakian said.

Continued assurance that student businesses have a place in the new Student Union is also an important issue with Avakian. "I think student businesses should have the prime locations.

Avakian feels the administration made a big mistake with the new procedure regarding the admission policy, stating — "they presented it wrong, and did it without input."

According to Avakian the decision is difficult to change because of the Boston Latin decision, but geographic and economic targeting and race-based decisions can be used if they conform to the Bacci decision.

In looking to voters for the elections today and tomorrow, Akavian said — "Students should vote for the candidate with the most experience and ability to get things done."

waste of time and energy. They spend too much time fighting over petty issues."

Palmucci went on to say that if SGA meetings were shorter and at better time for the students there would be more participation. "I'd like to make SGA more responsive to the students needs and schedules. I will make the meeting more productive. SGA has to be a decent venture for your time. Right now thirty seats need to be filled, if SGA wants people to be involved they have to stop with the frustrating behavior. As president I would be there to see to it. I want to be a mouth piece for the students."

One of Palmucci's issues concerns keeping change jingling in students pockets. He wants to create a plan for cheaper textbooks. Palmucci's vision is to form a "coalition of students and teachers, who's sole purpose is to deal with the used textbooks." According to Palmucci teachers would sign a contract saying they would not switch textbooks for a two years then the coalition would rent the textbooks from $15 to $20 a semester.

Palmucci would also like to see all of the SGA money given out every year leaving no surplus. "SGA thinks they need to be cautious about how much each registered student organization should get," said Palmucci. "But I feel any organization that takes the initiative to organize should get money. This is students money and they deserve it. We should not be rolling money over."

When discussing the current protests on campus, over UMass admissions policy, Palmucci suggested a committee meeting. Palmucci would create a "volcanic committee" to bang out ideas, and I would chair it.

the summer and create a task force for an in-depth study on parking services. I want SGA to pay for the students to come look at the parking problem during the summer. Students should come up with a plan and then I will follow through on it," said Tamulis.

The annual spring concert which is often an important issue to the students on this campus is another one of Tamulis's interests. If elected he says, "spring concert will be a week long event involving as many campus organizations as possible. The events will be tied together by a common theme and in the end we will have a huge concert of unheard of proportions." According to Tamulis he would book bands that would be diverse enough for everyone to enjoy. The week long festival would include cultural politics, education, and entertaining activities, but according to Tamulis planning must start now.

On a more serious note according to Tamulis he is also dedicated to making administration upholds its promises regarding the admissions practices to insure that the students who have raised valid concerns are heard.

"I feel the numbers the administration has shown the SGA in terms of ALANA [Asian Latino African Native American] enrollment for next years freshmen class is unacceptable regardless of what label is put on the issue. Next years class may suffer. I feel very strongly that a compromise can be reached between the administration and the students. When it is reached it will be important that the leadership is prepared to hold a pledge to diversity.

[current SGA staff] don't use their power to it's full extent. For example, with the privatization of the Campus Center, the SGA seems to side with the administration."

Another issue for Whitehouse is the card boxes that residents who live in the dorms swipe their student identification cards through in order to gain access to their respective dorms. According to Whitehouse, only one door of every building can be used to get in and out of. However students leave through unauthorized doors which causes alarms to sound. The alarms can go off for sometimes longer than a half an hour and are disruptive to students who are inside the building.

"There is an overwhelming referendum for it and the SGA failed to act," Whitehouse said.

As for affirmative action, Whitehouse is in favor of a plan to increase enrollment of ALANA students to 20 percent. Whitehouse sees major flaws with an income-based admissions policy.

"If we accept more students with lower incomes but don't increase financial aid, those potential students will not be able to come here," Whitehouse said.

Although Whitehouse does not completely agree with the old affirmative action policies he supports the students who protested the change.

"I was glad to see students active, campus at times seems totally dead. Rallies mean students care about what is going on around them. Of fifty-two people on my floor only one is black, that's ridiculous and unfortunate."

Whitehouse hopes for an "honest campaign and everyone plays by the rules, and that students vote."

the school but with incoming students," said DeCruz.

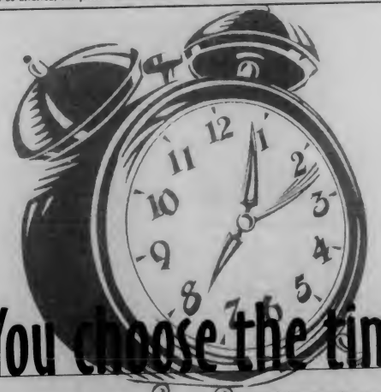
DeCruz plans on working hard to lower out-of-state tuitions.

"I want to see what's working and what's not working, then find a place to cut things. State taxes pay for UMass but it does not constitute for the discrepancy in the tuition prices. We need to find a happy medium between in and out-of-state tuitions," said DeCruz.

DeCruz also plans to look into more parking for students and housing policies for off-campus housing.

When asked about the admissions policy, DeCruz did not feel he could formulate a solution on his own.

"That issue isn't for one person. Many different people would have to be involved, one person can't fix it alone. One year isn't enough time, [changing admissions] is a long process and we have to work for the future. They've [university administration] worked for the immediate and you've seen what happened and the reaction that followed," said DeCruz.



An open forum would not be DeCruz's answer because that would be like "unleashing a lion," but a structured debate would be acceptable as a way to try to solve the issue.

DeCruz hopes more than four percent will come out and vote.

"Voters should find out who will represent them the best and then vote. If you don't come out and vote then you can't complain," said DeCruz.

Vote yes!

When University of Massachusetts students head to the voting booths across campus today, their choices will concern more than just the SGA candidates. A referendum question asks students whether or not they wish to allow MASSPIRG to continue to put a waivable fee directly onto students' tuition bills. Having the seven dollar waivable fee enables the UMass chapter of MASSPIRG, which is one of twenty-four statewide chapters, to exist as an organization dedicated to various public issues, and ultimately a variety of student interests. If students were to vote against keeping the waivable fee on their bills, the organization would no longer operate on this campus.

Because MASSPIRG lobbies for issues important to all students, a vote of "yes" to keep the fee is important. With a scope ranging from cleaning up local power plants, to stopping Arctic oil drilling, to warning students about shady credit card company practices, this organization provides a collective voice for the diverse individual interests on campus. As a public policy organization, the goals of MASSPIRG continually evolve with the input of concerned people. Keeping the local chapter by supporting the referendum question ensures that UMass students have a vital voice in statewide issues, and the ability to be heard on difficult public problems. In a nation increasingly controlled by wealthy special interests, public grassroots groups are essential in keeping policy democratic.

Sixty percent of students last semester chose to pay the dollar fee: money that helped organize and lobby for environmental and social issues. But the increase to seven dollars this semester begins to approach expensive territory. Though it may pale next to the hefty tuition bills of students, the fee is waivable to students for any financial or political reason. Unfortunately, voting for the continuation of MASSPIRG also assures that the fee is raised on next year's bill, and with the financial concerns of many students, the increased fee could deter potential donors.

Even if students choose not to pay the fee when their bill comes, it is important that students allow for continued existence of MASSPIRG by voting yes in today's election. Clean air, homelessness, and a variety of other issues MASSPIRG concerns itself with affect every student on this campus, and every resident of this state. By voting to keep the waivable fee on tuition bills, students are voting to have a larger voice in fighting collective problems.

From a distance

My spring break sucked.

I think I would have rather been here reading my Canadian politics and having hip replacement surgery. I spent my break at home after they kicked me out of the dorms.

I escaped for one day to Maine to ski Vacationland, my ass. All I remember was being behind some patriot with a flannel shirt and a gun rack mounted on his tractor as he sped at 15 miles an hour on his way to First Amendment Adult Book and Video.

My friends and I got to the ski resort just in time for the great spring thaw of 1989. The snow was literally sliding off the mountain and I was covered in sweat.

The night life was much better. Everywhere you looked were hordes of Canadian families on vacation. Bitchin' There were three Canadian girls who looked like they were in high school, but other than that it was family fun with mom, dad, and their six little Canadian kids.

Matt Frascella

For the rest of my vacation I decided to do something productive and thought provoking. My dreams of entering into the Guiness Book of World Records for creating the biggest ball of ear wax were shattered when the '99 edition came out, and I discovered that some loser named Mike Messaros spent all of the early nineties locked in his room with Q-tips and a mission. I had read all of the Danielle Steele novels at the supermarket so I opted for my third choice: watching TV.

" I didn't have to shell out all the money to travel, just to sit on my white Irish ass out in the sun to be burned, or bother with those wonderful hangovers."

After watching hours of other colleges that are actually good enough to make the NCAA tournament play basketball, I decided to wander up the dial and see what everybody else was doing on their Spring Break by watching MTV Spring Break. If I couldn't have the real thing, I could watch it and live vicariously through my television. Besides, Britney Spears was one of the hosts so I was instantly glued to my set.

Let me tell you, watching it on TV was so much better. I didn't have to shell out all the money to travel, just to sit on my white Irish ass out in the sun to be burned or bother with those wonderful hangovers. I got everything I needed on TV. I saw all the beautiful scantily-clad people and those MTV hosts made me feel like I was right there in those picturesque locales with clear blue water and white sandy beaches. I like to call it Distance Spring Break.

Now I know where our esteemed chancellor is coming from. I must admit that I don't see eye to eye with that overpaid Scottish world traveller very often. It may stem from the time he shoved me out of the way while I was waiting to talk to the women's gymnastics coach. I was about to say something assertive to him like, "hey, who the hell do you think you are, you poorly dressed punk-ass?" but the dark suit and white generic sneakers tipped me off that it must be my favorite chancellor and I kept my mouth closed.

Or maybe my pristine image of the chancellor was destroyed when my friend said he showed up at the marching band banquet with a little too much Scottish whiskey in him. Despite our past differences, though, I think his distance learning idea is purely brilliant.

Picture this: Scott wants to set up a video camera to tape lectures and broadcast them to us in our dorms. Who cares about oversized classes or the cut in faculty? This will solve all our problems. It is genius. Cut faculty even more and admit even more students so that we can all pay thousands to watch TV. Movies cost $8 now so lectures should go for a few thousand.

I can't wait. Next year I can set my VCR to record my early class so that I can sleep. No more half-hour treks in Arctic winds to Holdsworth to sit in a hot, stuffy, overcrowded room. No more interaction with classmates or professors. I can go to class right in the comfort of my own home at times that are convenient to me. If I'm hard I may be able to fit class in after Jenny Jones and before Love Connection. Who needs personal interaction when technology can enhance our lives.

There are some minor problems that may arise. What if I set the VCR to record the wrong channel?

"Damn. I recorded the International channel again. Maybe I can catch that American Foreign Policy class on a rerun next week."

The professors will need some big time help with technology, too. Some professors at this university can't even plug in an overhead projector or figure out the intricacies of the wireless microphone. If Brandy and those little blond devil spawns named Hanson can use one, you should be ashamed if you can't.

I propose that we have underwear models read the lectures. That way more people will tune in. We can even get area businesses to advertise.

"Today's Economics 104 lecture is brought to you by Liquors 44. Nowhere in the valley will you find a cheaper, shadier bottle of vodka that also doubles as gasoline for your car. Liquors 44. Close enough to Hadley to smell the manure."

Distance Learning is fantastic. Next we can get rid of all those buildings where we used to have lectures. We can build even more dorms (hopefully they will all be able to resemble the tasteful style of the Fine Arts Center complete with its orange neon light) to house even more students.

Our Distance Learning will be so great that the increased tuition revenue can go to inflating the chancellor's and President Bulger's salaries. Even after those mammoth expenditures, we should be able to have some big budget lectures. Screw the underwear models. We could bring in real talented actors like Keanu Reeves. Excellent.

Mr. Scott, keep up the good work. And to all those people who think that you get paid to do nothing, forget about them. You are the Barenaked Ladies of the academic world. Distance Learning is the future. We can even change our motto: "UMass... where it's almost as good as the real thing."

I'm going to have a Distance Lunch, take a Distance Shower, have a Distance Haircut, and take a Distance Test.

Bombs bursting

Kosovo, where the hell is that, you ask? Well it's a province between Serbia and Albania that consists of 90 percent ethnic Albanians, yet it belongs to Serbia and the Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic.

The Serbs have current control of the province know as Kosovo and committing what President Clinton called massacres against the ethnic Albanians. Although the province of Kosovo has political autonomy, Milosevic has the ability to take away whatever autonomy they have anytime he wants.

He is currently doing that as he has marched troops in and out of Kosovo at will, killing off members of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) at will and killing whatever ethnic Albanian citizens that get in the way of his conquest of Kosovo.

NATO and the United States have been trying as of late to bring the two sides to a peace agreement, but the Serbs have failed to comply. The ethnic Albanians in Kosovo have agreed to put down their weapons if the Serbs do, but Milosevic refuses to do so.

NATO has been forced to threaten Serbia with air strikes if they don't agree to a peace treaty. This show of force would also call for 28,000 ground troops. Although only 4,000 of those troops would be Americans, the public in this nation and the Congress seems weary of sending troops to Serbia. Why?

GOP Senators like Don Nickles (R–Oklahoma) and Kay Bailey Hutchinson (R-Texas) have expressed their displeasure with the president to go ahead with possible bombing strikes.

"The president has no right under the War Power Act to declare war," Bailey said. Several of the senators are saying that constitutionally, we shouldn't get involved in a civil war that we don't know how to get out of.

It's simple... they're worried about situations like Bosnia, Somalia, and Rwanda. People don't want to send troops into random countries to fight for something they feel doesn't involve this nation's vested interest.

But this is clearly something that affects the future of this country. Remember that the "hands off" policy of the United States throughout this century as is pertains to Europe has produced bad results. After all, the United States had a laissez–faire policy in regard to a dispute early in the century: in this same part of the world and it resulted in World War I, where many more troops died than was necessary.

In the 1930s, a leader called Adolph Hitler, who was quite a totalitarian like Milosevic, was left to roam free in Europe and do as he pleased. This leader built strength due to a weak economy and the next thing you knew, we had a holocaust where six million people of the Jewish faith were murdered, and several more million soldiers died: a part of what we know as World War II.

The fact of the matter is that we as a nation can not allow Milosevic to do as he pleases and must force him to comply with NATO's demands. The United Nations forced Saddam Hussein to comply with its sanctions, now the country is weak enough militarily, as they don't pose a serious threat to its neighbors.

Paul Teves

People say in reference to Hussein that those sanctions are hurting the people of Iraq. That those same sanctions are killing babies and making it so the Iraqi people don't eat, but the fact of the matter is that the reason the Iraqi people aren't being fed and aren't being treated well is because they are under the rule of a dictator who would rather pour billions of dollars into the construction of nuclear and biological weapons than feed his people. So the United Nations did the right thing.

If NATO plans to have any serious power in the future in solving foreign policy problems, they will need to act alongside the United States, who has taken on a smaller role in this dispute, to make sure that Milosevic isn't murdering ethnic Albanians, and isn't just trying to muscle his way around a weaker eastern Europe.

"Although the province of Kosovo has political autonomy, Milosevic has the ability to take away whatever autonomy they have anytime he wants."

On Monday, the United States was sending Richard Holbrooke into Serbia to try and work a last minute peace deal, but as it stands right now Milosevic feels that it would probably be better for him politically if he survived a NATO bombing strike — as opposed to letting Kosovo gain it's independence.

For the United States, the key will be to strike now and strike quick and make a statement to other potential murders who are heads of state, and show them that they are not just going to use force and kill whomever they want and take whatever land they see fit. This is not the "Dark Ages" and one cannot just lay claim to land by killing off its former inhabitants.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts, operating solely on revenues generated by advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1903, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. The Collegian has been published daily since 1967, and has been a broadsheet publication since January 1994. Best time of the year

You know that holiday song, the one that describes Christmas, wreaths and elves and all that as part of the "most wonderful time of the year?"

Well, not to disheartien all of you avid elf fanatics, but I have to strongly disagree with that notion. Yes, Kris Kringle is great, but the holiday season pales in comparison to the part of spring semester that follows Spring Break.

Elsa Allen

I am particularly excited this year for a plethora of reasons. The main one being that the countdown to graduation can now officially start. But, in an effort not to anger those who will not be I starting that countdown for several semesters to come, I will focus on the many other reasons that make this the most wonderful time of the year.

Reason number one: MTV's Spring Break specials.

For all of us who could not make it to Cancun or Negril for the week, MTV has graciously supplied us with the antidote for our cabin fever. I don't know about you guys, but I absolutely love watching obnoxious strangers get totally wasted as they romp around in the tropical waves. I feel especially good about myself while sitting in bed at three in the afternoon eating Corn Pops while Busta Rhymes prances along a runway filled with bikini-clad super models.

On a side note, where exactly do they find those Spring Break undercover people that they follow around all week? Hooters?

Reason number two: Hearing the stories from those people who actually did make it to a "Spring Break hot spot."

The stories that always begin with the phrase "Dude, I was so fued up..." and end with a sordid little detail that actually makes the one hearing about it feel good about not going on Spring Break. For those of us that were stuck in the colder regions over break, it's these stories that remind us how not worth it it is to spend $1,500 to puke in a foreign country.

"Where exactly do they find those Spring Break undercover people that they follow around all week? Hooters?"

Reason number three: the weather.

Call me quaint, but it warms my heart to see people hanging out on the grass, tossing a frisbee or a baseball around. It warms my heart, that is, until one of those damn baseballs flies three inches from my temple and into the glove of a half–drunken baseball–pro wannabe. But that brings me to number four.

Reason number four: Drinking during the day.

There is just something about strolling through campus with a Coke bottle full of Captain Morgan's, attending all– day parties outside, passing out by eight o'clock. Not that any of these things go on at this campus, no siree, Bob. But my friend who goes to one of those crazy... uh, southern schools, tells me these stories, and well, it just sounds like a hoot.

Reason number five: No more UMass basketball.

I don't really need to expand on this, do I?

We all have our own reason for loving (or hating) this time of year. Did I mention that there are only six weeks to graduation? Only six weeks left of hearing about how liberal arts majors don't have a snowball's chance in hell of doing anything. Only six weeks left of Chancellor Scott and whatever it is he does or doesn't do. Only six weeks left of having the cops called on my apartment by the wicked witch downstairs (but that's an entirely different ball of wax right there). Most importantly, only six weeks left of hearing that guy in your class tell his friend just how hot that girl in Cancun was and how many tequila shots he did. Unfortunately, there will be more than six weeks of MTV Spring Break re–runs (if you didn't catch Jordan Knight and Joey McIntyre on "The Grind", you're in luck).

If six weeks is too long for you to wait for something, stick around for about four — they're bound to attempt another Hobart Hoe–down. Keep your eyes peeled.

My life as a dictator

I'm throwing my hat into the ring. Actually I'm throwing my pink and blue striped beanie with the purple propeller into the ring. I don't really like the beanie, and I've decided to run for dictator of UMass in the upcoming elections.

There is discontent in the populace these days, and it's time for an election. Students often complain, "Why doesn't SGA do something?" I'll tell ya why. They're too busy having sexual relations with their interns. SGA needs a dictator to line all the senators up and smack them on their bare bottoms with a salami. Yeah, that will shake things up around here.

My agenda for the 1999–2000 academic year is simple. What will I do as dictator of UMass?

First, I would abolish parking services — I say free parking anytime, anywhere on campus. If you want to park your lime green V–W bug in the elevator of your building, go for it. As long as I don't want to park there; if I do, you will be forced to eat a whole salami.

Alexis Pushkar

Second, I would do nothing about Whitmore. After all, without Whitmore there would be nothing for people to complain about and if people don't have anything to complain about, that spells the demise of the Ed/Op page.

Under provisions of my dictatorship, I would abolish the SGA, representative democracy, no matter how useless and ineffective, has no place in an autocracy. Then I would establish myself as dictator for the rest of my natural lifetime. Thus there would be no more elections, a savings of time and money for the UMass students, most of whom don't vote for anything anyway unless it involves beer.

Phase two of my dictatorship would begin in the 2000– 2001 academic year. I think the time will have come for Western Mass. to break away from Eastern Mass. Face it, nobody who grew up near Boston even knows that Western Mass. exists. To a Bostonian, there is Worcester, which is mostly buried under excessive amounts of snow, and then there is New York. Nobody in Boston would miss Western Mass. We could sneak away and form a new state called New Mass with the state capital being, of course, UMass itself.

New Mass would have a great deal of potential as a state. Most of the inhabitants would be cows, and they have never caused a dictator an ounce of trouble in all of human history. As long as they have grass and we have some air freshener, harmony will reign. Just don't feed them any salami. I figure we can grow all our food on farms and still have some land to grow the pot that I need to keep control of thousands of college students. As long as they are mellow and don't know what's going on, they won't cause any trouble and will stay in UMass for the rest of their natural lives.

After taking over Western Mass., it is only a matter of time before I will have enough power to take over the world. I figure we can use the cows. We can drop them from planes, and they will have signs on their backs that say, "You are now a citizen of New Mass. Congratulations! And here's a salami."

Then you can bet we'll see some real changes. First of all I can row around the campus pond proclaiming, "I'm queen of the world," to the ducks. Second we can cut tuition all together and have a spring concert with real big bands playing flawed versions of stuff that everyone has heard ad nauseam on the radio anyway.

Third we can take all the money in the world and use it for residence area programs. Everyone will have to attend a minimum of 300,000 in their lifetime. What fun we will have!

It will take me a few years to get things organized on a global level. I'll need to set up a few million more Whitmores throughout the world so that everyone can gripe about something trivial instead of worrying about issues like world hunger. I figure if there are Whitmores everywhere, they will just bring people closer together.

I'll also need to set up more weed farms to make people happy. After all, life should really be about love and brotherhood. By 2010 everyone will be driving V–W bugs, eating salami, smoking a lot of weed, wearing tie–dyed tee– shirts, and listening to Janis Joplin. It will be like the 60s without all the political upheaval.

The beauty of it is, there would be no more "real world" for UMass students to worry about. There would be no careers, no boring office jobs and no briefcases. There would be no graduate schools and thus no GREs, MCATs, and LSATs. There would be no taxes and no credit card bills. There would just be lovin'.

If you support this vision of the future, it all starts right here, right now. Vote for me in the elections this week. And peace, dudes.

Plastics my boy...

Until very recently, I found life after college a bit difficult to imagine. Soon, however, my beloved alma mater will shove me and my classmates gently (but firmly) into the outside world. I admit, this prospect is not without appeal. The days of communal bathrooms and pop quizzes will be gone.

Never again will my internal organs face the perpetual onslaught of institutional food. Yet leaving Smith also means... the job search.

I am well aware that some of my classmates popped out of the womb knowing they would someday be doctors, lawyers, or managers of the Third Sales Division. For the rest of us, however, plans after graduation can be a real quandary made all the more stressful by the need to pay off staggering loans (I'm already there is no such thing as debtor's prison in the United States). Somehow we have to find something to do with that Women's Studies degree while still making a buck. And oh yeah — it would be nice if it was something we enjoyed.

Kate Neville

"The days of communal bathrooms and pop quizzes will be gone. Never again will my internal organs face the perpetual onslaught of institutional food."

It happens to every senior sooner or later; you wake up one day and realize the temporary nature of your dorm room. With this comes the added realization that you probably ought to familiarize yourself with that small yet strangely imposing building: the Career Development Office (CDO). Eventually, instead of walking by it, you manage to work your way up the steps and into the building where you discover dozens of seniors just like you already pouring through heavy blue binders.

The CDO's slogan "It's never too early, it's never too late" begins to take on new meaning. Maybe you sit down at a computer. Maybe you make an appointment with a career counselor. Regardless, you have now officially joined the ranks. Soon interviews, resumes, and cover letters become as much a part of your daily routine as quizzes and response papers.

You can tell almost immediately when a friend has begun this process. Baggy cargo pants give way to skirt suits. Words like "team", "orchestrate", and "systemize" creep into their vocabularies. One by one, seniors eliminate ZZ Top and Hole from their answering machine messages in favor of formal, scared–sounding greetings. The words are carefully enunciated, lest the potential employer mistake that key digit and wind up giving the job to someone else.

"Hi. This is 242–357–9113. Please leave a message and I'll get back to you as soon as possible."

As time goes by and more students appear coifed and subdued, the temptation to compare notes grows ever greater. Questions range from the subtle "So... been to New York recently?" to the blunt "Didja get a callback? Didja didja didja?" Such questions are usually a bad idea, because everyone else inevitably seems better prepared than you are. You ask anyway though; the impulse to confirm this fact is not unlike the impulse to stare at an accident scene.

Excitement over the prospect of graduation combines with job search anxiety to create a testy atmosphere. Seniors huddle over CDO computers alternating between frantic activity and languor. The grown-ups in our lives attempt to reassure us, many by offering well-meaning advice.

One math professor at Smith is notorious for telling all of his advisees to join the Peace Corps (where he met his wife). Others insist that we should take full advantage of our education by attempting to make as much money as quickly as possible. Alternately, understanding parents and jaded career counselors trot out the well-worn refrain that we should "do what we love" and that this is "a time to experiment."

"These days most people change careers at least seven times" they insist. "You'll be fine." Yet deep down, all seniors suspect that what one does after graduation is nothing short of a life and death matter. How can they be so calm and reassuring? Don't they know that the apocalypse approacheth?

In the end, however, they are probably right. I suspect that the real challenge of the job search is conquering one's own self doubt. Talk to professionals in your field. Take a job aptitude test. Or you can be like me and spend your time inventing crazy alternate plans.

My latest mission: Tae Boa instructor.

A mix of race and class

[Editor's note: This is the final half of a two–part column.]

Books like American Apartheid confirm that low–income whites, like their more affluent co–racialists, are far more likely than minorities to have attended affluent schools from elementary through high school. According to UMass economist Nancy Folbre, over 65 percent of blacks would have to move in order to achieve residential desegregation in the U.S. What should be done about wait–listed METCO students who have the potential to do well here, but because of residence — no fault of their own — haven't been able to gain access to the best preparatory institutions?

Deirdre Royster and Dean Robinson

A second pattern related to wealth differentials shows that white families hold far more wealth than minority families. For example, there is a stunning statistic in Black Wealth, White Wealth: for every dollar of wealth that whites hold, blacks hold 12 cents. This pattern isn't connected to different savings patterns but rather to differences in inheritance and home–ownership patterns that have always advantaged whites over blacks, irrespective of class. The study showed conclusively that working class white families have greater wealth holdings than professional black families!

As a result of such patterns, white grandparents and parents are able to rely upon their reserves, rather than loans to provide financial support for all sorts of competitive strategies — SAT preparation courses, for example. Minority grandparents and parents, as a result of past and contemporary discrimination, have very few assets that can be liquidated to help college–aged kids and grandkids. To contrast, white grandparents — perhaps even more than parents — frequently have resources that allow them to provide grandkids with private high school educations, first cars, books, a computer, spending money, summer employment opportunities and so forth. These kinds of resources matter but will not be factored in when students are evaluated for admission or financial hardship. As a result, typical minority families will be expected to make incomes stretch much further than typical white families, who are much more likely to have wealth–based financial cushions.

In a related vein, statistics on family configurations and resources suggest that minority families experience burdens even when some aspects of disadvantaged status are shared, such as that associated with female–headed households. While no single mother has it easy, white single mothers are more likely than minority single mothers to petition for and get alimony and child support payments which make part–time working a possibility while raising kids; to continue living (post–divorce) in an affluent community with great schools; to have parents and parents–in–law who are affluent and presumably generous to grandkids; and to be college educated themselves. Some of these kinds of advantages are common for minority single mothers and some are difficult for administrators and financial aid officers to take into account.

This means that white single mothers with moderate incomes and access to affluence, may be viewed exactly like minority single mothers with moderate incomes and no access to influence. This hardly seems fair. In addition, minority families are more likely than white families to spread income among a number of less fortunate family members including elderly parents, uncles and aunts, making fewer resources available solely for college–age kids. Financial aid forms simply don't capture these racially divergent realities.

So what does all of this tell us? Race and class are intertwined — they emphasize class disadvantage over race disadvantage and ignore the independent effect of race found in study after study in our society. What else? Even when intentions are good, as seems the case with our esteemed Chancellor, it is a mistake to base important policy decisions — decisions that will affect thousands of young people's futures — on faulty and incomplete reasoning and data.

Half full?

People often ask me, "Chris, it seems that you always have something interesting and funny to say. Do you ever get writer's block?"

My rather obvious answer to this question is, "Of course, I do, but being the cleverly imaginative person that I am, I have learned ways to avoid such problems when it comes to composing my column."

For example, large amounts of caffeine and ridiculously late hours are a great way to stimulate those lazy synapses in my brain to start producing the All–American column that the four (yes that's right I've got another reader!) people on campus who read my work have come to expect.

Anyone catch on that I have a case of writer's block yet? Good. Really, I can drop it then and use my other favorite method of curing the dreaded block. This method is to find something ordinary and figure out a way to expand it so that I can write a whole bunch of words about it. Usually this allows me to try all sorts of jokes and offend more groups on campus than I like to think about.

Chris Collins

Anyway, my idea this time is to apply the famous, "Is the glass half full or half empty?" debate on all the different majors that exist here at the University.

Naturally, I'm going to begin with my major, just because I think that proving that I am able to laugh at myself will prevent some of the more sensitive readers from reacting to this column as if a small furry animal had attached itself to their armpits. Thus, when an English major looks at a glass of water, he or she wonders about the inherent symbolism of the water and its life–giving potential. This also would bring forth allusions about the many great stories told involving water, such as Moby Dick, Billy Budd, and Waterworld.

A philosophy major will wonder if the water was predestined to be half filled/half empty and whether it really is the water that he/she is seeing or if the water is simply an illusion created by Descartes' evil genius. A computer science major will not care either way, but will make damn sure that it doesn't come close to his/her hard drive. A physical education major knows that it is empty, because he/she will have downed it after all that exercise.

A chemistry major will see it only as a whole bunch of little H2O molecules, each of which is composed of smaller atoms, which are in turn made of little protons and neutrons, which are, of course, made up of quarks which are in turn made up of... well you get the idea. An art major will see it only as the perfect amount of water to clean brushes in.

A history major will immediately assume that it is half full, because you really have to be an optimist to study history. A hotel, resteraunt travel administration major will wonder why none of the waiters have come over to fill this glass of water, and they will wonder who was stupid enough to hire such terrible servers.

A political science major will agree with whatever the polls say: half full one day, half empty the next. A French major will say, "Quand! Ce n'est pas de vin!" (Loosely translated as "What? This is not wine!") A home economics major will not care whether it is full or empty, just that he/she will need to clean the glass when it is finally all the way empty. Likewise, an school of management major will not care whether the cup is half full or empty, but he/she will be able to tell you how much the water that is there could be traded for in half a dozen different countries. He or she might also try to steal your glass to sell it, but only after all the water is gone.

An engineering major would decide that it was half empty because it is much easier to design a bridge to go across something that is half empty than something that is half full. He or she would also be more than willing to draw up plans for this bridge, but will forget to carry the one so it will continuously lose bricks from the sides until it collapses. An advertising major would see it as half full and they would use Wile E. Coyote and Larry Bird to sell it to the American people. Then, if that didn't work right, they would start using the slogan, "Sprite is nothing. Drink water."

A Middle Eastern studies major would see it as half full because if you are out in a desert doing field work, you would much rather have a half full glass than a half empty one. A psychology major would ask the water what its dreams were, how its mother was, and then decide that the water could not resolve its problem without intensive counseling that is available for $100 per hour and no less.

Anyway that's the way that I handle having nothing to write about, and I remind you that the glass is never half full if you can find a way around it.

XTC hits all the right notes

APPLE VENUS VOLUME 1
XTC
TVT

Strange is a relative term.

XTC, remember them? They weren't exactly beloved our time. They were known in the eighties for their brand of "out there" pop, producing a variety of weird albums and the alternative hit "Dear God."

They have been immortalized by They Might Be Giants in the song "XTC vs. Adam Ant." Well, it seems that Andy Partridge and Colin Moulding have reunited as XTC to put together a fun collection of twisted, bitter, and just plain goofy sounding new songs.

The new album, penned mostly by Partridge, recalls XTC's best work as the duo performs as if the past decade never happened. "Your Dictionary" is a memorable track, as well as "Greenman." Apple Venus Volume 1 is an album that retains most, if not all of the band's original strengths from reuniting after almost ten years, unlike some other bands that have released albums recently.

There is talk of a tour. Maybe David Lowery will quit Cracker and reunite Camper Van Beethoven, and the two could open up for each other...

Now, that would be a cool show. A (Kevin Monahan)

WORD OF MOUTH PARADE
Gus
Almo Sounds

Mainstream folk rock in America has taken on a new form: Adult Contemporary Music. This vague term seems to encompass just about every thirty-something with an acoustic guitar and a repertoire of lost love and heartbreak. This new album from Gus, 'Word of Mouth Parade,' on Almo Sounds, fits snugly into this category.

Gus isn't a band, but a man. Taking cues from a strong singer-songwriter tradition of Cat Steven's and Carole King, Gus plays a blend of folk and pop-lite to create pleasant songs, the kind you may hear as you're trying to settle on a radio station during your morning commute. You settle on the song, and before you know it, you're humming along and sympathizing with the crooning voice inside your radio.

Overall the record is uninteresting. Most of the songs are generic, occasionally throwing in an organ or a lap steel guitar for variety, but overall, Gus is no different than a coffee-shop performer you could catch in Northampton. His album won't yield any hits or start a musical revolution, but it may lyrically entertain you until the next performer takes the stage.

The process repeats itself. C (Neale Gay)

The Corruptor chokes on racial politics and sick self-indulgence

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

THE CORRUPTOR
Directed by James Foley
with Chow Yun-Fat, Mark Wahlberg, and Ric Young Playing at Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield

The Corruptor is a gritty, well made, Hong Kong-by-way- of-Hollywood action movie that hides some complicated, questionable racial politics behind an entertaining, if conventional, buddy-cop storyline. Goody-goody detective Danny Wallace (Mark Wahlberg) is assigned to the all-Asian New York Chinatown unit which is headed by the incredibly smooth Lt. Nick Chen (Chow Yun-Fat). The mismatched pair begin by arguing, but eventually bond before the unavoidable final shoot out. The Corruptor, however, is not a straight battle between good and evil. Everyone is somehow corrupt. In fact, the police corruption is sometimes practical, and even ends up indirectly saving lives. The question for the cops to corrupt themselves isn't as easy as "yes or no," it's "how far do you go?"

This sort of moral grey area is nothing new to the gangster movie, and The Corruptor doesn't say anything particularly new, but what it does say it says well, thanks to solid directing and acting. Director James Foley uses the jittery- "NYPD Blue" style to great effect, spicing things up with some surprising zoom [illegible]. The film is short to seem just a little more bright and blurry than in real life which, combined with the unsettling score, duplicates the paranoid energy of having too much caffeine and being locked in a maze. Hong Kong star Chow Yun-Fat plays Nick Chen with glee, force, and grace: part James Bond, part Fred Astaire. Mark Wahlberg's soulful deadpan provides a perfect foil for Yun-Fat's unpredictability.

Where the movie loses its footing is in its depiction of ethnicity and immigration. Clearly, the makers of The Corruptor have these issues on their minds, as proven by the scenes with the downtrodden illegal Asian immigrants locked in a basement and hiding in the bells of a ship. The movie wants us to sympathize with the immigrants plight, but it gives us the same old cliches and stereotypes: a vicious Mafia in an ethnic community, painfully silent and sexually promiscuous Asian women, an ethnic cop who risks his life to save his partner and uphold the law. The story is not only about the cops becoming friends, it's essentially an assimilation story: Nick Chen gives up his ties to the Chinatown community (which, in the movie's mind, is exactly the same as the Mafia) and becomes an honored American. There's nothing wrong with a story about assimilation, what's wrong here is that assimilation is presented as the only morally supportable path. At every turn, evil, crime, violence, and excessive sex are intimately linked with Chinatown and Asian people.

And where do the immigrants fit in? Don't read more if you don't want to know the ending. In the chilling last scene, the cops, guns drawn, walk through a narrow hall in the belly of a ship which is lined with quiet, poor, desperate Asian would-be immigrants. A woman starts screaming and talking hysterically in a non-English language. No subtitles are given. Her screaming fills the hallway and the movie theater. For those of us who don't understand her language, the scene is singularly confusing and frightening. We don't know what she is screaming, we don't know what is going on. By virtue of her incoherent language and actions, the immigrant woman is presented very firmly as an alien. Her screaming provides the perfect cover for the silent approach of a gunman, who appears out of nowhere, as if emerging from the distracting smoke of the woman's alien words, and fires on our heroes. In the movie's logic, the Asian immigrants are poor and needy, but they are also very different from Americans, and that difference hides danger. We should be afraid of them. All the movie tricks and good acting in the world can't save The Corruptor from being corrupted by its own quiet racism. F

THEMES
Gigolo Aunts
E Pluribus Unum

Whoa, I don't think I can handle this much rock. After a label induced standstill, the Gigolo Aunts have released a new LP of pure power pop (don't believe all the other bands labeling themselves as "power pop." The Gigolo Aunts are the real thing).

The album gets off to a quick start with "C'mon, c'mon," but seems to slow down with songs like "Everyone Can Fly," "Half a Chance" and "You'd Better Get Yourself Together, Baby." Although songs such as "Super Ultra Wicked Mega Love" and "Everything Is Wrong" have all the necessary adrenaline expected from this band, Adam Duritz's involvement doesn't hurt (surprisingly). B+ (K.M.)

CAN YOU STILL FEEL?
Jason Falkner
Elektra

You've got to hand it to a guy who plays all the instruments and pulls it off. Falkner takes comfort in the sounds of the past — somewhere in the seventies. The cover art features decommissioned jet airplanes and a shot of Falkner sitting in old style airplane seats covered in a very hip, orange fabric. The opening track is one of the best starts to a disc in a long time. "Author Unknown" begins as a ballad before exploding into a song jammed with power chords and a chanted chorus. Each track is a well-produced, dense mix of instruments and words. Falkner is a perfectionist who knows how to surprise the listener — whether it is with a whispered conclusion on "My Lucky Day" to police sirens on "Revelation." B+ (Matthew Nixon)

ONE HUNDRED
The Controls
Sm:)e

Oh my! I can picture the day when this bunch of New York City musicians got together after listening to too much Portishead and decided to have a go at it. The female vocalist is very Beth Gibbons. The beats are another story. They plod along and quickly bore. "Shere Kahn" and "Home Again" add a rapper named Aesop Rock to the mix and things go from bad to worse. Yawn. C- (M.N.)

CRUEL INTENTIONS
Original Motion Picture Soundtrack
Virgin

Want to get a sense of what pop music is all about right this very moment in the first quarter of 1999? Then pick up this soundtrack from the film starring Ryan Phillippe and Sarah Michelle Gellar. Heavy on tunes from Virgin and associated labels, the music is a mainly mellow and atmospheric collection of songs ranging from "Coffee & TV" off of Blur's new album to the orchestral magnificence of The Verve's "Bitter Sweet Symphony." The funky good time of Fatboy Slim's "Praise You" pops up as do haunting new songs from Counting Crows and Kristen Barry. Other tracks are from Faithless, Marcy Playground, Craig Armstrong and Placebo. A well thought out collection of songs. A- (M.N.)

Collective Soul
Atlantic

What a surprise! This is a recording worth investigating. Ed Roland and company have outdone themselves. Their third album is a pop masterpiece. "Heavy" is the first hit. It is one of the catchiest pieces of music to come along yet this year and is light years ahead of previous hits such as "Shine." The song features an infectious guitar effect. Clever and distinct uses of the guitar give many songs on this album their beauty. "Tremble For My Beloved" is an over- the-top album opener — in the best sense of the term. It calls to mind Rush and Achtung Baby-era U2.

The band are just as comfortable rocking out as they are at slowing things down. Ed Roland has a versatile voice that can sound both menacing and soft, almost Sting-like on "No More, No Less." There is no filler here. Even the hidden track is worth waiting for. The disc features "HyperCD" software that enables fans to access another via the band's website. With so many one hit wonders these days, Collective Soul has given us one hit after the other over the years. Dosage proves that this band is one of this nation's greatest at the moment. A- (M.N.)

scene, the cops, guns drawn, walk through a narrow hall in the belly of a ship which is lined with quiet, poor, desperate Asian would-be immigrants. A woman starts screaming and talking hysterically in a non-English language. No subtitles are given. Her screaming fills the hallway and the movie theater. For those of us who don't understand her language, the scene is singularly confusing and frightening. We don't know what she is screaming, we don't know what is going on. By virtue of her incoherent language and actions, the immigrant woman is presented very firmly as an alien. Her screaming provides the perfect cover for the silent approach of a gunman, who appears out of nowhere, as if emerging from the distracting smoke of the woman's alien words, and fires on our heroes. In the movie's logic, the Asian immigrants are poor and needy, but they are also very different from Americans, and that difference hides danger. We should be afraid of them. All the movie tricks and good acting in the world can't save The Corruptor from being corrupted by its own quiet racism. F

NBA

Webber has been quite a revelation for the Kings, who did not know what to expect out of the Fab- Fiver. C-Web is well on his way to his first rebounding crown, and he even has the Kings thinking about a playoff spot.

Karl Malone, Utah, 23.6 points, 9.4 rebounds — While most of the sane world is waiting for the "Mailman" to retire to postal land, he keeps on plugging with unbridled success.

Tim Duncan, San Antonio, 21.6 points, 12.1 rebounds, 2.6 blocks — A certain starter in the East, Duncan will be the sixth man for this juggernaut. He may not have more talent than Robinson, but as this juncture he is more willing and able.

Antonio McDyess, Denver, 21.2 points, 10.6 rebounds — Although he punished himself by opting to return to the Nuggets over Phoenix, his individual numbers have not suffered the slightest.

Kevin Garnett, Minnesota, 20.3 points, 10.9 rebounds — The $120 million man is only the fifth-best forward on this team, but until the Marbury trade, he had the Wolves on the verge of a major breakthrough.

Hakeem Olajuwon, Houston, 17.5 points, 9.5 rebounds — The only back-up center on either team. The "Dream" may have slipped from his brilliant 1993-95 form, but he still has an aging Rocket team performing at the highest level.

Jason Kidd, Phoenix, 14.8 points, 11.8 assists — Still not a true scoring force, and he may not ever become one. However, his ball distribution skills are incomparable, which will make him an invaluable component once he has a better supporting cast around him.

Kobe Bryant, Los Angeles, 19.5 points, 6.9 rebounds — While he was prematurely voted by the fans to start in last year's contest, Bryant is now ready to rightfully assume a role on the West team — as a reserve.

J.R. Rider, Portland, 16.8 points — His statistics are not the most overwhelming numbers on the planet, and his conduct is even less impressive, but the overall results out of Portland (20-5) have been astounding. Rider is the go-to guy there, so he gets the final invitation to the gala.

Vaughn slip through his fingers, and deservedly so. Duquette has proven that he is not willing to keep an All-Star player, no matter how talented, if the player crosses his path. Duquette has stumbled over his own tangled web of contradictions, first vowing never to allow a rerun of the Roger Clemens fiasco, and then shoving Vaughn away for nothing in a move that reeks of hypocrisy.

Now, Duquette is left with a team that more or less has invested its playoff hopes in two players. Even if Garciaparra's injury amounts to nothing, fans will be forced to watch the upcoming season with baited breath. Season ending injuries that are obstacles to other teams will be nothing short of crippling to the Red Sox. Injury is an inevitable component to any sport. It is the teams that have the depth to face injuries, like the Yankees, that contend for championships.

Last season, when Vaughn was injured, Garciaparra was there to pick up the slack. Likewise, when Garciaparra separated his shoulder, Vaughn hoisted the team on his shoulders. This season, if Garciaparra is gone, who can step up in his place? John Valentin? Mike Stanley? Jose Offerman? While these are all good players, they can't come close to generating the success that Garciaparra produces.

The void that Vaughn has left is painfully apparent as the Sox await the verdict on Garciaparra's injury. But Sox fans are conditioned for moments like this. Even the high hopes of the optimists cannot abate that oh-so-familiar sense of dread. Fingers are crossed in hopes that Garciaparra's bat and glove will not be silenced this season.

Red Sox Nation holds its breath.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — The more you're willing to compromise today, the more you're likely to be the real winner in the time to come. Give now and receive later!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You have a chance today to break a record or two, at least unofficially. Never fret, you'll be recognized for your accomplishment.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You mustn't be so considerate of others that you forsake your own ideals and beliefs today. At least consider working towards a compromise.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Your opinions are changing at this time, and may be harder than expected to get "in sync" with those who work closely with you on the job.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — A slightly more casual approach to the most serious issues can pay off handsomely for you today. Superiors are impressed by your demeanor.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Once others have things "set up" for you to your satisfaction, it's up to you to get the ball rolling in no uncertain terms. Take the initiative!

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Quality control is an issue today. You don't want to settle for anything but the best, even though it may cost you a little more money.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Someone may tell you an idle story today that may give you the key to a personal mystery you've been trying to solve for a while.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — The approval of an elder is all you need to feel as though you've really accomplished something important. You're likely to get it!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You can use the element of surprise to your advantage today, but you must be sure your own preparations are complete. Don't jump the gun.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may be allowed to do something today which has been strictly forbidden in the recent past. Be cautious, for someone may be trying to trick you.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You'll work well with those who claim to have no allies. Your support can mean the difference between a stalemate and a resounding victory.

All–Stars chosen for hypothetical mid–season game

We're halfway through this abbreviated 1999 NBA slate, but for the first time since the inception of the All–Star Game in 1951, there will be no mid–season classic due to the lockout. For those fans suffering from major withdrawal symptoms, sit back and enjoy the listing of these would–have–been All–Stars:

Eastern Conference: (Five starters listed first)

Allen Iverson, Philadelphia, 29.0 pts, 5.5 assists, 2.5 steals per game — Iverson is a shoo–in to start at the "one" for the East, and will be one of the leading candidates for league MVP come May. Coach Larry Brown seems to have finally convinced Iverson to clean up his act, which is a main reason the 76ers are one of the biggest surprises in the NBA.

Mitch Richmond, Washington, 20.3 points — Some may point to the fact that Richmond is primarily a one–way player, but this classy veteran can flat–out score. He has the highest point average among Eastern shooting guards, a testament to his starting role in this game.

Alonzo Mourning, Miami, 20.0 points, 10.5 rebounds, 3.5 blocks — The clear–cut choice as the man in the middle. After many years of toeing the line in regards to the upper echelon of pro centers, Mourning has finally established himself as one of the top three forces to be reckoned with down low.

Shawn Kemp, Cleveland, 19.9 points, 9.4 rebounds — After arriving at training camp as if he thought it was a fat farm, Kemp trimmed down his frame, and turned up his game to the level it reached when he was known simply as the "Reign Man."

Grant Hill, Detroit, 22.1 points, 6.1 assists — While proclamations labeling this former Dukie as the next Jordan may have been far–fetched, Hill is now a perennial all–star starter certainly capable of at least carrying a portion of the NBA's torch into the next century.

Glenn Robinson, Milwaukee, 18.8 points, 5.7 rebounds — "Big Dog" will be the first man off the bench for coach Pat Riley, as he has led the resurgence in Milwaukee, with the Bucks challenging in the Central at 15–10.

Antoine Walker, Boston, 20.5 points, 8.5 rebounds — Despite a horrid game against Chicago on Sunday, his well–rounded repertoire is almost unparalled these days.

Toni Kukoc, Chicago, 20.8 points, 7.8 rebounds, 5.1 assists — Kukoc leads the suddenly hapless Bulls in all three of the aforementioned categories, and there is something to be said for that. Considering Coach Tim Floyd's other options, there is not too much to be said, but give this guy credit, he's trying.

Tim Hardaway, Miami, 19.0 points, 7.9 assists — One may ask, "Would Mr. UTEP two–step over Rod Strickland?" Affirmative, because while Strickland continues to dish out over 10 assists a game, he still hasn't been able to bring his squad to the next level, as Timmy has almost always done.

Stephon Marbury, New Jersey, 18.9 points, 8.7 assists — Yep, still no Strickland. Marbury did most of his damage out "west" in Minnesota this year, and he had the Timberwolves playing solid ball, so the 5–20 Nets get a representative via technicality.

Nick Anderson, Orlando, 18.0 points — Penny Hardaway will be one unhappy camper, but Anderson gets the nod over him as the Orlando entry. While Hardaway (14.8 points, 5.2 assists) has been a force after squabbling with Chuck Daly last year, Anderson has been on an offensive rampage all season.

Reggie Miller, Indiana, 17.9 points — It almost hurts to include him because this team already has two pure shooters in Richmond and Anderson, but Indiana is tops in the Central now, and Reggie is still the best they've got.

Western Conference:

Gary Payton, Seattle, 22.3 points, 8.3 assists — The "Glove" may not be the league leader in steals anymore, but he has an uncanny knack for combining timely passes with a powerful scoring punch that leaves all other point guards envious.

Shareef Abdur–Rahim, Vancouver, 23.4 points, 8.6 rebounds — He's the superstar that nobody knows about, and how could they? Vancouver has been on national television twice in franchise history.

Shaquille O'Neal, Los Angeles — The biggest bully on the block since Wilt Chamberlain himself, O'Neal has finally gotten what he wants; sheer dominance. David Robinson and Hakeem Olajuwon are well past their prime, so O'Neal has no true competition for this spot anymore.

Chris Webber, Sacramento, 19.7 points, 13.4 rebounds, 2.5 blocks —

Baseball drops first home game, 13–6

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

It was the difference between a team exploding with self– confidence and another stretching to meet the .500 mark in the early stages of a season.

The Massachusetts baseball team (5–7) dropped a 13–6 decision to a Providence College squad making the most of its last year in existence. The Friars improved their winning streak to 13 games while simultaneously ending the Minutemen's 5–game winning streak.

Craig Szado earned the start for UMass, lasting 6–1/3 innings and allowing nine runs on 11 hits. The sophomore also walked two and struck out 10 batters.

"I felt strong," Szado said. "They are a good hitting team."

The Friars opened fire first as outfielder Mike Scott doubled and then scored off an Angelo Ciminiello single to center field. UMass' Brian Samela responded with his first home run of the season over the right field fence in the bottom of the first.

Providence got lucky in the early innings as a couple long balls sent the Massachusetts outfield scampering into the gaps. Ciminiello picked up his second and third RBI of the game when he doubled to Steve Asadoorian in center field, scoring Neil McCarthy and Keith Reed.

The Minutemen were dormant until the fifth inning when Shaun Skeffington unloaded for another home run. At that point the score was 4–2, PC.

Providence had begun to take its toll on Szado. Ciminiello, who went 4–for–5 with a home run in the seventh, led off with a single to right center. Paul Costello followed with a walk and Szado opted to intentionally walk first baseman Jeremy Sweet. It seemed like UMass might escape a potentially dangerous situation when Szado recorded two Ks. But Scott hammered a triple to right center, sending all three on base home to make the score 7–2.

"They were loosey–goosey up there [at the plate]," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "They were a team playing with confidence."

The Minutemen went down 1–2–3 in the bottom of the sixth inning when PC tacked on two more runs in the top of the seventh. After a Reed strikeout, left fielder Mike O'Keefe belted a home run that landed high atop the William D. Mullins Center roof. Ciminiello then added his home run. Szado was pulled and sophomore Nick Skirkanich closed out the inning in relief.

UMass showed signs of turning it around in the bottom of the seventh when Seth Kaplan opened with a walk and first baseman Gavin Clark nailed a liner down the right field line. Skeffington loaded the bases by reaching first by way of error. Bryan Mazzaferro took advantage of the opportunity and hit a sacrifice fly deep to center field, scoring Kaplan. Redshirt freshman Scott Anderson, who had been hit by a pitch in the third inning, then drilled his first home run into the trees in center field, making the score 9–6.

In the eighth, Jesse Santos relieved Skirkanich, who was eventually saddle with two earned runs. Santos struggled with control, walking two and giving up another home run. Senior captain Bill Cooke then took control of the mound replacing the freshman. Cooke, the only senior on the pitching staff, finished out the game allowing four hits while striking out two.

Freshman Ryan Lewis went the distance for Providence. The southpaw struck out nine and walked three en route to completing the full nine frames.

Providence finished with 16 hits and one error while the Minutemen totaled nine hits and recorded one error.

"We could have made some better plays defensively in the first and second inning," Stone said. "We didn't burt, steal many bases or take advantage of certain situations. They just beat us— there's no big mystery."

Today the Minutemen head to Worcester to face the Holy Cross Crusaders.

Women's lacrosse looks to improve to 3–1

Rebecca Minaker has been a thorn in the side of Vermont for two years

COURTESY JORMA KAYGANEN

Rebecca Minaker has been Vermont's worst enemy over the course of the last two years, and she'll be gunning for the Catamounts again today.

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (2–1) is set to face the Vermont Catamounts (0–2, 0–1 America East) today at 3 p.m. on Garber Field. The Minutewomen currently hold a 5–2 advantage in the series with Vermont, including a 17–4 drubbing last season.

The Minutewomen stand poised to improve to 3–1 on the year if they can get past UVM at home. At this point in the season last year, UMass was at an even 2–2, with tough teams like Dartmouth and Syracuse still left to play. The Minutewomen look to have a firm hold on their season heading into their date with Syracuse at the Carrier Dome on Saturday.

"Every game is a big game. We have no pushovers and we are not looking ahead," said UMass coach Francesca McClellan of the Vermont contest. "It will be exciting to go and play at Syracuse, because a lot of our kids are from Syracuse and it's a homecoming of sorts for them."

In last year's win over the Catamounts, the Minutewomen outshot UVM 44–17, proving the dominance of UMass in the contest. The Minutewomen also held a slight groundball advantage, 30–23 in that match.

UMass has had their own Catamount killer in junior Rebecca Minaker, who has had two stellar performances against Vermont in her first two meetings with them. In those two games, she has collected a total of five goals and two assists. The Newton native collected four of those seven points against Vermont in her freshman season when she netted a hat–trick and added an assist. Minaker is also coming off of a productive outing against New Hampshire, tallying another three goals.

"In terms of Rebecca Minaker, she had a really good game against UNH, and she has been struggling a little in her own head, but it's good to see her have a great game. It's very exciting for her and certainly exciting for the team," McClellan said.

The Minutewomen are also recovering from injuries suffered in the win over New Hampshire. Tara Durkin suffered a sprained ankle and Colleen Wales injured her knee. Durkin is expected to play while Wales' status is still unknown. Is the artificial turf going to continue to provide problems for the Minutewomen?

"We are getting a little tired of it [turf]. But it is a luxury to have. We don't have to play on Totman, which, due to the rain, is certainly wet," McClellan said. "We have been playing on it for a long time and we will be playing on it this weekend, so I don't think it would be of any help to the kids to go to grass and then back to turf."

Besides dealing with injuries, the Minutewomen had to deal with a devastating loss to Boston University last Wednesday, 8–6. The loss hit hard as the Minutewomen came in to the season ranked No. 20 and had very high expectations. Coach McClellan talked about the team's attitude since dropping the match with BU.

"We are really coming off an interesting Spring Break. We have come off it feeling rather beat up, even though we had two really good matches. The BU loss was a shocker for us. We had to regroup and stop looking ahead," McClellan said. "We need to continue improving, not being too cocky and perform hard for 60 minutes, play well and create some momentum."

Vermont is 0–2 thus far this season, with both losses coming on the road. The Catamounts' two losses have come against the lower scale of lacrosse, losing 12–9 to Fairfield and falling in overtime to conference foe Drexel 9–7 to start the season.

Although favored, the Minutewomen will need to watch several players on the Vermont squad. Freshman standout Courtney LaMere, who has already tallied four goals and an assist in her inaugural campaign is a virtually untested force. LaMere is a player that both UMass and Vermont recruited coming out of C.W. Baker High School, and LaMere decided to play her collegiate lacrosse at Vermont.

"She (LaMere) made a great choice for her and she is doing a good job there. She is a real nice team player and that's what we liked about her. She has a lot of variety in her game, good hustle, great stick skills and a good well– rounded player," McClellan said.

Coach McClellan's club will also need to look out for returnees like junior Anne Bowman and sophomore Liz Lundgren who have each collected three goals in the early part of the Catamounts' season.

UMass will also need to watch junior Shannon Croce who has had a slow start so far this season — having scored only two goals — but Catamount coach Sarah Nelson needs her experienced midfielder to explode against a high–powered Minutewomen offense.

Sox lose Nomar; Mo's absence becomes glaring

Oh, Optimistic Ones, show us the way.

As Sox fans bid farewell to their beloved Mo Vaughn over the off–season, it was the optimists who smoothed the ruffled feathers of the Red Sox fan–dom. It was the optimists who silenced the doomsayers with the uttering of a single name — Nomar Garciaparra. He is talented. He is a clubhouse leader. He is a class act. He is The Franchise.

Jen Cormier

Unfortunately, he is injured.

It is getting harder and harder to suppress the panic that is on the verge of exploding throughout Red Sox Nation. Garciaparra has not played shortstop since March 11, due to what he has described as a sharp pain in his throwing arm. What was first regarded as a common injury — biceps tendinitis — has become enough of a concern to propel Garciaparra to seek a second opinion in Los Angeles.

After days of nonchalant and evasive comments about his tender right arm, Garciaparra was examined by Red Sox physician Arthur Pappas. Pappas announced that it is not Garciaparra's biceps (as was earlier eluded to by management), but his elbow that is the primary area of sensitivity in the arm. Garciaparra has flown to L.A. to see Dr. Tony Daly for further examination of what Pappas has described as a mild strained ligament.

Although Pappas has remained optimistic, fear and paranoia have begun to creep into the minds of many a loyal Sox fan. Although Garciaparra did participate in workouts last week, it was observed that he avoided making the vital throw from short to first. Reports out of ESPN claim that Garciaparra will be out for at least 6 months and possibly the entire season. However, the Red Sox organization is nowhere close to revealing whether or not there is truth in this.

The forecast for a season minus Garciaparra is a gloomy one at best. While the Sox are solid on offense and defense, they lack significant star power. With Vaughn gone, only two marquee names remain; Garciaparra and pitching ace Pedro Martinez. If Garciaparra is sidelined for the season, all eyes will turn to Martinez. But as dynamic as Martinez is, with as much dimension as he adds to the team, he only plays every fifth game. The All–Star pitcher simply does not have the power to carry the team on his shoulders. No one pitcher can.

A season–ending injury for Garciaparra will no doubt mean that General Manager Dan Duquette will face even more heat for letting

UM women's tennis gets burnt in Florida over break, lose to SU

By Jason Owens
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team were beaten by Syracuse 9–0 last Tuesday on their annual Spring Break trip to Delray Beach, Florida.

"We didn't play well," said a Coach Judy Dixon. "For the first time this season, I can actually say that I am disappointed in this team. Our play was spotty."

The lone highlight for the Minutewomen may have been the return of talented freshman Allie Tross, who had injured her thumb earlier this season in an auto accident. Tross, playing in the No. 6 singles slot, took Syracuse's Katie Thompson to a No. 3 set before running out of gas.

"She did well and I told her so," said Dixon. "Her thumb was hurting her, her wrist was hurting, but she stuck it out."

Nevertheless, Dixon could have used a win from Tross' spot, but that was just one disappointment in an afternoon full of them. "We should have won three of those matches. I would have been happy with a 6–3 finish.

"Syracuse is ranked No. 115 in the country and we rank about No. 140. There's no reason we shouldn't take a couple of games."

Dixon singled out No. 1 singles player Ola Gerasimova as one player who struggled to play up to normal standards.

"Ola didn't play well in singles or doubles. She couldn't seem to get her feet underneath her," Dixon said. "It may have had to do with it being our first match outdoors."

Another disappointment was the finish of the No. 4 singles player, freshman Helana Horak. After taking Zarzecka Borucka to a third set, it seemed that Horak had the match at hand, but things fell apart quickly — in the end resulting in a 7–5 loss in the third–set tie breaker.

"I would have liked to have gotten more out of Helena," said Dixon. "She had the match well in hand, but her footwork really let her down. Her lack of quickness hurt her. She can't afford not to be aggressive in that [the tie–breaker] situation. She was very conservative."

The Syracuse match spells the end of what Dixon calls the "take–it–on–the–chin portion of the season" for the Minutewomen. It is an appropriate name for an opening stretch that saw UMass shut out by three Ivy League teams before suffering the same fate at the hands of Syracuse.

"We have to learn to win again now," says Dixon. "We are done playing all these tough teams, but now that we're getting into our Atlantic 10 schedule, we have to start winning games. It's been a while."

For Dixon, it is the A–10 portion of the schedule that will determine the success or failure of the Minutewomen's season.

"The time for tinkering with people's games is over. Now it's time to win," Dixon said.

UMass travels to Colgate on Saturday at 9 a.m.

Cevallos speaks to 300 protesters; old admissions policy "not legal"

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

In search of answers and action, hundreds of students marched across campus to the Whitmore Administration building yesterday where they spent two hours talking to interim Vice–Chancellor for Student Affairs, Javier Cevallos.

The crowd of approximately 300 ended up at Whitmore after several speakers rallied students on the Student Union steps. The crowd headed to the administrative center chanting "The students united will never be defeated" and continued across the campus and Massachusetts Avenue.

"I think this is just a start and there's going to be a lot more action," said Jeanne Fuqua, a senior women's studies major while marching to Whitmore.

"When you have this much emotion on such a hot issue, you don't want something to get out of hand," said Ricardo Townes, assistant vice–chancellor for campus activities while marching with the crowd that had been warned about the real possibility of being arrested if the picketing code is violated. "I don't think the administration realizes the resolve on the part of the students... and that's not good."

Then walking in pairs and chanting "No justice, no peace," students marched up the walkway to Whitmore. There, the two straight lines of people reaching back to neighboring Herter Hall, stopped to make a decision.

Kiya Stokes, a graduate student and member of the steering committee of the task force for equal opportunity and access for all people, asked the columns of students if they wanted to enter the building.

With an affirmative response and a warning from Stokes to not touch anything or anyone in the building, the students marched in and wouldn't be exiting for four more hours.

Cevallos came to the lobby of Whitmore where approximately 150 of the students remained chanting, beating drums and giving speeches for an hour and a half after marching through the building.

"We have made a series of decisions already (about the admissions policy)," Cevallos said before speaking to the students. "We don't negotiate with any kind of demands."

Cevallos then stepped forward for what would be a heated two hour question–and–answer session with students.

Students first expressed anger about the recent change in the admission policy that no longer uses race as a significant factor in admissions.

"We are all working toward a goal. Our goal is to recruit a class that reflects the diversity of graduating high school seniors (in Massachusetts)," Cevallos said to the students through a bullhorn. "I'm a Latino and I am a strong believer in affirmative action but I also believe in the law. We are in a state institution and we have to follow the (state) laws."

But students reacted with shouts of "what law?"

"There is no law in Massachusetts that says you have to abolish affirmative action. (UMass is) caving–in to pressure from the right wing," said Jon Zibbell a graduate student.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

A student poses a question to interim vice chancellor for student affairs, Javier Cevallos during a sit–in in Whitmore yesterday afternoon.

Cevallos said the change in the admissions policy was because for the past four years, three of the six categories that applicants are put into had disproportionate acceptance percentages between ALANA and non–ALANA applicants. Nearly 100 percent of qualified ALANA students were admitted as opposed to the 65 percent of qualified non–ALANA students that were admitted.

The first three categories are of applicants with the highest grade point averages (GPA) and SAT scores and class rank.

The fourth, fifth and sixth categories consider SAT scores and GPAs but also take into account other factors, like race, overcoming adversity and special talents. This is where, Cevallos said, the disproportion was occurring.

"This admissions procedure is not legal," he said.

Out of the six categories, Cevallos said this year, all students that fall in the top three categories will be accepted, as well as in–state applicants in the Task Force organizes sit–in to prove point

By Danielle Fugazy

Protesters who occupied Whitmore administration building for approximately four hours yesterday left at 5:00 p.m. with positive feelings of what they had accomplished.

Members of the Task Force for Equal Opportunity and Access for all People took turns speaking at yesterday's sit– in. The members that have been very involved with the organization of the task force said that yesterday was a good start and warned it was only the beginning. They also voiced frustration over the fact that no one with the authority to change the admissions policy has met with them.

"[The sit in] is great, but it is just the first step. I am tired of meeting with people who don't have the power to make the decision. We want our demands met by the Chancellor, Bulger, and the Board [of Trustees,]" said Kiya Stokes, a graduate student.

Justin Beatty, a junior legal studies major who led the protesters in song, said he, too, was sick of not talking to the people who have the power to change things. "They think it's an ALANA issue so they send an ALANA person who is not in the position to do anything."

Another frustration that came up at yesterday's sit–in had to do with the administration that are located in Whitmore closing down their offices when the protesters came in. The leaders of the Task Force made it clear to protestors that they were not there to stop students from tending to their business in Whitmore, yet most of the office doors remained closed throughout the entire sit–in.

Ross Singleton, SCERA Coordinator, started demanding answers from administrators when a student who came to seek help from financial aid complained that it was closed. Singleton brought the student to Kenneth Burnham, the interim director of financial aid, and made sure the student got the help he needed.

After helping the student Burnham said, "I have mixed emotions needless to say. I am a strong advocate for affirmative action. However, with respect to financial aid, it would appear that the courts are very clear about what we can and can not do with respect to targeted financial aid. Clearly, the changes to the diversity scholarships will have an impact on the numbers of ALANA students that we will be able to support with those funds." He also said in regard to the actual sit–in, "Right now we are not overly busy external–

UM receives grant to help incoming students

By Jake Lilien and Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

In the midst of numerous student rallies protesting the treatment of low–income students at the University of Massachusetts, the university has received a $207,377 state grant from the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education to assist disadvantaged students who have been admitted for the upcoming academic year.

The funds will go directly to the Student Support Transitional (SST) Program, designed to increase the enrollment and first–year retention rates of disadvantaged students.

Gloria De Guevara, the associate dean of enrollment services, and Jannette Mendez, an administrative intern, will be coordinators of the program.

According to Assistant Vice Chancellor for Enrollment Services Jon Marshall, the grants are "strictly defined but generally based on low–income, first generation historically disadvantaged students" as well as disabled students.

Marshall says the grant will "span the spectrum" from the time of student's admission to UMass through their graduation from the university.

One example of the assistance provided by the grant, Marshall pointed out, is to assign personal mentors and tutors to students, and put all 100 students in the same residential program, similar to the TAP (Talent Advancement Program) and RAP (Residential Academic Program) programs in Patterson Residential Hall.

"It's similar... only we're taking it to the extremes of that," Marshall said.

According to Marshall, this grant is only one of three significant grants Enrollment Services is in charge of.

The office is currently working on a grant that Marshall called "the grand–daddy of them all."

This federal grant is part of a new program called "Gear Up" which would create a partnership between seventh grade Springfield students and UMass.

"We're targeting the low income, disadvantaged population," Marshall said.

Marshall outlined the three–fold goals of the grant, with a primary interest in making sure students complete high school, and then to help them complete college, and hopefully interest them in attending UMass.

Although Marshall emphasized the primary goal.

"The reality is I want them to graduate high school," Marshall said.

Marshall stated that the grant is unrelated to the recent changes in affirmative action procedures, as he had drafted plans for the grant last semester.

SGA commuter area senator resigns

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association meeting got off to an unexpected start last night when Senator Brandon Beane found the commuter area resigned. He expressed disappointment in the SGA as a whole.

"I am disappointed with student government, last week we faced an important issue and brought up a motion, and people don't even care enough to cast an opinion. Action, or abstention isn't saying very much, you just wanted to get home early," said Beane.

He also pointed out that five new senators were appointed last week and able to vote immediately. According to Beane they made the motion pass. "Five new senators were appointed, I don't agree with stuffing the senate for one issue." He ended by saying, "If you don't explore you'll never find anything. I am resigning, effective immediately."

The issue Beane was referring to, a motion about the University of Massachussetts admission policy, last was on the senate floor March 10.

When the meeting got underway the senate spent over an hour debating one motion which in the end failed. The motion was for covering the costs associated with voting. UMass students can currently vote in Hampden Dining Commons for Amherst town election if they are eligible to vote in the Town of Amherst.

Arif Sayani, a senator from Orchard Hill, spoke adamantly against passing this motion. "It will only benefit students who are really interested in voting anyway and those students will go vote anyway," said Sayani.

SGA Secretary Brenda Fitzpatrick spoke for the bill. "This allows students to have a voice. And if there is low turnout it is our failure too. We need to get them out there as leaders on campus," she said.

A motion to spend more money on SGA's election was passed, and extra money was given to Southwest. The senate passed a motion giving Southwest $1350 so they could have an adequate amount of money for Southwest week. The need for extra funds comes because portions of the Hampden student center have been condemned and a tent rental needed to be secured to insure there will be a Southwest week. After little discussion the motion passed.

Elections for SGA President, Trustee and Area Governors are still going on today. Voting booths are set up at Dining Hall, the Campus Center, or the Newman Center.

Yugoslavia the target of allied missile attacks

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — American and allied forces pounded Yugoslavia yesterday with a heavy missile barrage that gave the bat–winged B–2 stealth bomber its first taste of battle and engaged Yugoslav pilots in dogfights that knocked at least two Soviet–made MiGs out of the sky. "The dangers of acting now are clearly outweighed by the risks of failing to act," President Clinton said.

Hours after the attack was launched, the House, in a 424–1 vote, voiced its support for U.S. troops without expressly embracing Clinton's decision to send them there.

In addition to hitting Yugoslavia's extensive air defenses, including communications and command sites, NATO airstrikes targeted at least one factory that makes parts for air defense systems, a U.S. official said.

The president's national security adviser, Sandy Berger, told The Associated Press that NATO would not let up.

"It's not a one–night operation," Berger said.

"Our firmness is the only hope the people of Kosovo have," Clinton said.

Defense Secretary William Cohen announced that all allied planes returned safely in the initial strikes. He said NATO forces would continue hitting the Yugoslav military until President Slobodan Milosevic relents in his campaign of repression and violence against the majority ethnic Albanian people of Kosovo, a Yugoslav province.

"We are attacking the military infrastructure that President Milosevic and his forces are using to repress and kill innocent people," Cohen said. "NATO forces are not attacking the people of Yugoslavia."

Fees to decrease in '99

The Massachusetts Board of Higher Education has voted to approve tuition and fees rates for the 1999–2000 school year.

The vote, which took place on Tuesday, March 16, made official the costs decided on by the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees. The average undergraduate in–state UMass student will pay $4,704 in tuition and fees, a $23 decrease from this year.

Originally, the trustees had agreed to slightly raise the cost of attending UMass, in what Student Trustee Eleanor Court called a "cost–of–living increase." Their first proposal would have lowered tuition for in–state undergraduates by $13, while raising mandatory fees by $91, an overall increase of $78.

The trustees changed their proposal, however, when Massachusetts Governor Paul Celucci expressed outrage at the decision and threatened to cut $4.6 million from the UMass budget.

The trustees compromised with Celucci by agreeing to lower student costs by decreasing the tuition rate even further.

UMass welcomes Jewish leaders

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Staff

Chairman Edger Bronfman and President Richard Joel of International Hillel Foundation urged Jewish leaders to reshape their vision of the religion's continuity at a visit to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst yesterday.

Bronfman, a billionaire and the Chief Executive Officer of Seagram company, spoke to students about his crusade to rekindle the Jewish spirit among young people across America.

"All my speeches and all my appearances are to inform [the Jewish community]," said Bronfman.

Joel further spoke about the need of Jewish leaders to reach out to the younger generation and inspire them through successful role models. He cited Bronfman's efforts to reach out to students as an example.

"To be able to spend time with one of the most successful chief executive officers of [an] industry, how do you put a price tag on that?" said Joel.

The younger generation of Jews is different from the one that grew up in the sixties, according to Joel. Current American Jewish students haven't experienced anti-Semitism in a significant way. As a result, they are less likely to personally identify with the Holocaust and with the oppression that traditionally engulfed the Jewish people.

"The whole issue is that this generation of Jews does not define themselves through the holocaust," said Joel. "This is the first generation where being Jewish is an option."

MELINDA NICKEL / COLLEGIAN
Edgar Bronfman

As part of Hillel Foundation's national effort, it spends about 37 million dollars a year in the United States to support Jewish campus life.

The leaders of Hillel believe that rekindling the tradition must start with young people.

They would like to see its campus branches as springboards for the "renaissance" of Jewish life. "How do you start with the Jewish home? I start with Hillel," said Joel.

The launch of Hillel Foundation's campaign of "Jewish Renaissance" comes in response to increasing challenges in American Jewish communities. The priorities are preventing the assimilation of Jews into Christian society and getting Jewish students to feel closer to their religion.

"We are probably collectively the most Jewishly ignorant generation since Egypt," said Joel. "Most Jews haven't had a Jewish conversation since their Bar or Bat Mitsva."

Joel linked the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt, which is retold every Passover, to what being Jewish should mean.

"They used their freedom to commit to something," he said.

Richard Joel also spoke at a dinner which included Chancellor David K. Scott, University of Massachusetts at Amherst administrators and faculty, and regional Hillel Foundation affiliates. Student leaders of the Jewish Student Union also attended the dinner, and Kolot, a student a capella group, made a special performance.

Joel spoke about how his role as president personally affected him. "It's been a sacred journey."

fourth category. He said in an attempt to accept more ALANA students, SATs are given less weight in the fourth, fifth and sixth categories because the test is known to be racially biased.

Students repeatedly asked Cevallos why the policy changed when it would decrease the number of ALANA students.

He said the number of ALANA students will definitely go down for the next few cycles of admissions while changes are made that will ultimately increase the number of ALANA students.

But students asked him why those students should be sacrificed. Several said their younger siblings won't be able to attend UMass because of the changed policy.

Some members of the crowd questioned Cevallos about the availability of more recent data about the number of ALANA students accepted for next year's freshman class.

Cevallos said the numbers weren't being released because they change from week to week as more applications are evaluated. Cevallos said about 22,000 applications have been looked at and 3,000 have yet to be examined. He had given numbers of ALANA students entering next year earlier this semester, but said those numbers were not accurate.

"They are snapshots from week to week. We read every one of those applications," Cevallos said. "My mistake was to produce those numbers that reflect a specific Friday."

Students often challenged Cevallos saying he was using "double speak" or not answering the questions at all. Student Government Association (SGA) Attorney General Jesse Burchfield expressed this frustration.

"Is there somebody in this goddamn building to speak to the students and speak the truth and not lie," he said.

SGA President Salwa Shamapande boiled down the issue.

"The problem seems to come down to the students not trusting the administration. You guys have to do some work on the front end to have us help you on the back end," Shamapande said. "Everybody here has got stuff to do. We're not coming to you because we're a bunch of students with nothing to do."

But Cevallos, while there to answer student questions, said they didn't know how to best increase UMass' diversity.

"We need help. If I knew the answer I wouldn't be here," Cevallos said, repeating his earlier statements that recruitment for ALANA students should start in first grade and that current ALANA students should tell individuals in their communities to come to UMass.

"I refuse to call somebody from my community and tell them to come here when they aren't wanted," Stokes said of the lack of support services for ALANA students. "You just want their tuition money."

As some students held their children, Cevallos was asked about financial aid and support for student-parents.

"Students aren't eating. Do you understand that?" asked Dana Woodruff a senior Hampshire College student who is part of the Survival Fund for University Parents which raises money for food and rent for student-parents.

"The only thing we can do is keep trying to increase financial aid," Cevallos replied.

But a change, at least anytime soon, won't be happening Cevallos said in an earlier interview.

"There's no chance of a moratorium at this point. The Chancellor is planning to appoint a task force to suggest different ways to deal with admissions," he said.

After speaking to the students, who often questioned his statements, Cevallos said he just hoped they believed him.

"This is true, what I'm trying to tell you. You can accept it or not. I can not do anything else," he said.

But students had a different feeling after leaving the building at 5 p.m. in accordance with the picketing code.

"They were just giving us the run-around today," said Cori Daddabbo, an undeclared freshman.

Dance is considered a form of expression and hobby for many students at the University of Massachusetts, but for senior dance and communications major Kellie Shea, dance is a way of life.

Practicing a minimum of four hours a day, every day of the week, there isn't a moment in her day in which she will not talk about the dance team, Shea said.

"People joke around with me and say that I'm obsessed with the dance team, but it's just that the team is really in my heart," Shea said. "What happens to the team is very important, and will be given when I leave."

As one of the three captains of the University Dancers, a UMass dance squad, Shea has been helping lead the team for over four years by dealing with the team's finances and much of the choreography in the dances.

In fact, Shea claims University Dancers is one of the only dance teams in the nation without a coach, and because of this, she and the other captains end up having to act and think like a coach.

"It's hard when we need to perform our dance and no one's there to point out our flaws in the routine," Shea said. "There's a lot of pressure on us as captains. It's a lot of time-balancing."

At times when the team needs feedback, Shea will stand out during a rehearsal and observe the group with feedback on how to improve their performance style. In the past, she has also dealt with representatives from the NCA/NDA (National Cheerleaders Association/National Dance Association) in regards to bills and competition rules. Shea feels it is all a lot of work, but when it comes down to choreography, the group can choose what they like.

"Having the girls choreograph their own dance routine has been more beneficial than bringing in a paid instructor because we can choose what dance moves we like," Shea said.

Every year the University Dancers participate in the NCA Dance Camp in hopes of receiving a bid for qualification in the national competitions.

"We go to try to learn new choreography and to qualify," Shea said. "The final day of camp, we ended up not only receiving the NCA Most Collegiate Dance Award, we also received a bid for nationals."

In fact, for the past three years, the team has sent dancers from UMass to the camp in hopes of qualifying. Each year they have come away with a national seat, the best all around dance team, first place for the "fight" song, first for team dance, at least one individual has been awarded with a "top gun" award, recognition to a dancer for their accomplishment in a certain dance combination, and have come away from the camp with an All-American award.

This year, Shea came away with the team's only 1999 UMass All-American dance award as well as a recognized "top gun" award in funk technique.

After getting into the nationals, Shea feels the biggest problem has been affording it. University Dancers is independently funded and is provided with no support by the university. Therefore, the girls have had to go to the local communities to look for support.

In preparation for this year's competition, Shea was in charge of organizing an Avon cosmetic drive, in which the team sold Avon products and got a profit out of the items sold. They also received support from the Student Government Association, alumni, and local fraternities.

Aside from making their own costumes, Shea says the preparation for a nationwide competition is difficult and with all the work it would be great to win.

"It would be a Cinderella story if we went down and won because the amount of work it takes to get down there exceeds amount of any other team in competition," Shea said. "It would be a dream come true if we won."

With the dedication, Shea has developed a close enough relationship with her team and hopes one day to come back to UMass and become coach of University Dancers.

"I would love to be the coach of this dance team especially because of all the experience I've had with it," Shea said.

Before graduating from UMass, Shea will be auditioning in Boston for a position with the Radio City Rockettes. Shea's future goals include taking over her mother's modelling business, but above all else, her dream is to dance.

A prep-rally will be held for the University Dancers on Tuesday March 30 at 7 p.m. at the Curry Hicks Cage.

ly. Internally, it's hectic in preparation for next years award cycle — any delay is critical. The activity down the hall could move at anytime."

Student Government Association President Salwa Shamapande summed up the fact that office doors were closed by saying to Javier Cevallos, Interim vice Chancellor for Student-Affairs, "We don't pay administration to hide from us. They closed their doors and they're scared."

Singleton commented on that as well. "People are behaving. I'm sorry other students can't do their business. Administration closed their offices like cowards. We're not here to hurt students, were trying to help."

Kenny Lacosta, a junior Afro-American and political science major, said, "Spiritually, it [the sit-in] was cool. A lot more people have to physically be here. ference that there was some air-to-air combat, but "our aircraft have safely returned" after the first wave.

A U.S. defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said at least two Yugoslav MiG fighters were shot down by NATO warplanes deployed to defend the aircraft carrying out the strikes. He said the Yugoslavs chose to use fighters for air defense instead of surface-to-air missiles. The Yugoslav air force is small, however, and no match for U.S. and allied fighters.

Speaking from the White House moments after a barrage of cruise missiles struck at Yugoslav air defenses, Clinton acknowledged the risk of American and allied losses. But he said those risks were outweighed by the dangers of not acting resolutely in the face of unrelenting Serb aggression in Kosovo. "Only firmness now can prevent greater catastrophe later," the president said. He promised a more complete explanation of the NATO attacks later in an Oval Office address to the American public. Republican and Democratic lawmakers alike expressed support for the mission, even if some harbored reservations about what NATO would do if air power failed to persuade Milosevic to back down.

Cohen said of the B-2s that "the aircraft performed according to its capabilities." He would not elaborate.

The B-2 is the most advanced stealth aircraft in the world — and the most expensive, at about $2 billion apiece. The plane was designed during the Cold War to penetrate the former Soviet Union's heavy air defenses and has come under harsh attack from critics as being too high-cost for today's military.

The initial NATO attacks also included Air Force F-117A stealth fighter-bombers, flying from Aviano Air Base in Italy, defense officials said. The F-117A played a starring role in the 1991 Gulf War against Iraq.

Members of Congress expressed qualified support.

"Whatever reservations about the president's actions in the Balkans, let no one doubt that the Congress and the American people stand united behind our men and women who are bravely heeding the call of duty," said Sen. Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss. Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said he expected the first wave of attacks to last for several days — to be followed by an even heavier bombing campaign against other targets. He said he did not expect a pause between the two phases, saying they would be seamless.

Clinton laid out three objectives to the airstrikes:

•"Demonstrate the seriousness of NATO's opposition to aggression and its support for peace."

•Deter Milosevic from continuing and escalating his attacks on civilians by "imposing a price for those attacks." He said Milosevic had chosen "aggression over peace" and broken his promise to "stop the brutal repression of Kosovo."

An immediate casualty of the NATO attacks was the alliance's already shaky relationship with Russia. President Boris Yeltsin pulled Russia out of its partnership with NATO and warned Moscow may take further steps to protest the airstrikes against Yugoslavia, including military ones "to ensure its own and general European security."

First word on the opening airstrikes came from NATO headquarters in Brussels, Belgium, where NATO Secretary-General Javier Solana said the final orders had been given by U.S. Army Gen. Wesley Clark, NATO's top commander. Solana on Tuesday evening had authorized Clark to act when he was ready.

Acosta–Velezto speak about Latino rights

Speaking on the national civil rights issues of Latinos, University of Massachusetts alumni Mario Acosta–Velez, executive director of the Latino Civil Rights Center in Washington, D.C., will be visiting the Campus Center tonight.

Invited by the Asian, Latino, African, and Native American Affairs (ALANA) Office, Acosta–Velez has spoken to numerous groups about civil rights issues.

In addition, Acosta–Velez said he has recently become familiar with the issues on the UMass campus regarding student protests over the admissions policy and affirmative action which is closely related to his topic tonight. Acosta– Velez said yesterday he was not sure if he would be directly speaking on the UMass admissions policy.

As executive director, Acosta–Velez provides leadership and supervision in all aspects of the Latino Civil Rights Center's Office. In addition to this, he advises the Board of Directors in developing policies that support the Civil Rights of Latinos. Acosta's other responsibilities include coordinating fundraising strategies, developing issue-oriented programs and initiatives to educate and organize the Latino community through developing representatives, both governmental and non-governmental.

Acosta–Velez has also been directly involved with various issues affecting the Latino community, such as immigration, education, employment,, community policy relations, discrimination and worker's issues.

Acosta–Velez holds a master's degree in political science from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. He also holds a master's degree in public administration and a bachelor of arts from the University of Puerto Rico.

Prior to his January 1997 selection as Executive Director, Acosta–Velez served as Program Analyst at the office of International Aviation of the Federal Aviation Administration. He also interned at the Office of Civil Rights of the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Acosta–Velez will be speaking in Campus Center room 101 at 7:00 p.m. tonight.

This program, a part of the ALANA lecture Series, is free and open to the public.

Is date rape less of a crime?

When it comes to rape, should one be less punished if they are acquaintances with their victim? A small group of faculty at Harvard believes so.

Campuses nationwide are experiencing a very similar problem. A sexual act occurs and one student says rape while the other says consensual. What do we do in these matters? Many want swift and strong punishment for the accused. But William Paul, a physics professor at Harvard feels differently. He believes that there is a clear difference between being jumped in a dark alley and date rape. That is true.

He also believes that date rape should have a lesser punishment than cases in which the victim is forcibly raped by a stranger. I completely disagree with this because in date rape you actually know the person who is assaulting you. In date rape, more than "alley rape," the rapist strikes for power, not just for sexual release. Power is always an issue in rape, though.

"Many students have responded with outrage, saying that the alternate proposal proves Harvard's long-standing pattern of minimizing rape victims' complaints," says the Boston Globe article from March 9, 1999.

Hundreds of students are expected to show their outrage during Junior Parents Weekend. They are demanding expulsion in letters being signed by parents that weekend. One student, Alexis Karteron, expresses her view very clearly. "This student being allowed to return to Harvard is very disturbing. This person is not someone we want as a member of the Harvard community."

Paul makes a good point by saying "There is a problem, that if you say anything that puts some responsibility on the woman, it is seen as blaming the victim." He also states that that is exactly what's happening in this case. But when looking at this case, how could the victim be blamed?

A basic recap: they (the two students who had been friends for some time) had been living in bed for about four hours, after drinking for the majority of the night. In the beginning, some sexual interaction took place, but no actual intercourse. She was drifting in and out of sleep, and he penetrated her. How can she be blamed? Yes, alcohol did play a part, but that excuses nothing. Two friends were under the influence, the female drifted in and out of sleep and the male "friend" took advantage of the situation.

The group of faculty that is pushing for a lesser punishment thinks that the accused should be allowed readmittance to Harvard. They also argue that it was consensual sex.

Later, when the case was taken to the college's administrative board, it was acknowledged that the male apologized and took responsibility, meanwhile admitting that there had been penetration. It was recommended by the board that he be dismissed, which is basically synonymous with expulsion in the Harvard code.

The Globe reports in court the man pleaded guilty to indecent assault which was characterized as "improper sexual touching." He was sentenced to 18 months house arrest at his home in Wisconsin, and five years of probation. The rape charge was not heard and will not be taken by violates probation. If he returns to Massachusetts, he must register as a sex offender.

Campus rapes are very difficult to deal with. Many women do not report assaults due to shame and the desire to avoid going through it time and time again. What makes it harder is that most cases are not clear-cut. Facts are not clear and gossip spreads. In this case, my opinion is that the accused did commit rape. The accuser drifted in and out of sleep and never actually gave consent.

> "William Paul, a physics professor at Harvard, believes that date rape should have a lesser punishment."
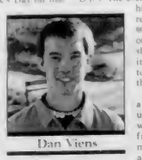
> Emily Vacanti

People need to understand that "Yes" should clearly be heard before a sexual act takes place. The accused could argue that alcohol had altered his judgement, and therefore he was not thinking straight, but the fact that she was not conscious during it destroys any argument that he has. She couldn't say "yes" or "no." The poor girl was asleep.



Even so, a campus coalition against sexual violence wants a policy adopted that says that any student convicted of rape be expelled. Dean Harry Lewis supports this and wants nothing short of dismissal.

Emily Vacanti is a Collegian columnist.

Fear and loathing in Montreal

We met an Irishman in love with expatriates, a Canadian in love with Cuban cigars and the women, the coolest pub owner, the most famous fiddler and the two most fun bartenders in Montreal. They all met nine guys from the states who were ready to have the craziest long weekend ever in that great city. Here is what happened.

The most outrageous event occurred on Sunday night in our favorite pub: D.J.'s. The entire city of Montreal was celebrating St. Patrick's Day on the very Sunday. In honor of this there was a duo playing Irish music in the pub. Seeing that I had drank about 25 beers and half that many shots, I found it absolutely necessary to get on the microphone in front of the 50 or so people there. My roommate lay used his uncanny powers of persuasion to get the mic in my hand. I then proceeded to tell the story about a mythical girl from UMass who has an 11-inch "love canal." The story itself is for another column, though.

Dan Viens

From what I remember and what I've been told, much of the pub was in hysterics, but one of the guys in the band was not very amused. My thirst to be the life of the party had yet to be quenched so I asked lay to get me up there again. After using his powers again, he got the microphone — on the conditions that he would be the one talking. He immediately handed me the microphone, and then I told the story about the kid from my hometown who got his testicle ripped off by a coat hanger. Again there was much laughter, but I was removed from the stage. To make a long story short (too late) the band apologized to the crowd and I left the bar feeling as much like a celebrity as a disgrace.

The next bit of outrageousness occurred much later on Sunday night. This occurred when Double A's friend Fitz #1 showed us his "member" tricks. I can't go into any real detail, but the names of his tricks are as follows: "meat on a platter," "the bowtie" and "the mother brain." Following that, was "the turkey" and the grand finale was the "sick dog." Just imagine a dog with one of those big lamp shades that they have to wear on their head when they get stitches or something.

Yet we did drink quite a bit and yes we sang and danced and saw a bunch of strippers, but the best part of the trip was the extraordinary people we met. I'll start with the Irishman that we met in D.J.'s. The events leading up to our encounter with him are a little hazy, but what I do remember is him screaming "Shut the @#%& up!" very loudly as only someone from Ireland can. Then I gave it a shot in my best Brogue. Before I knew it, everybody in the pub had joined together in a rousing chant of "Shut the @#%& up!"

The next insane person we met was a guy named Brian. I somehow struck up a conversation with him and a woman who I thought was his girlfriend. Before I knew it, we were making fun of each other's countries and nationalities in a semi-polite manner. He then bought me a beer and gave me a Cuban cigar. What happened next made me feel a lot like Jerry Springer. The girl whom he was sitting with was a Cuban woman who looked about fifteen years younger than him. I asked Bryan if she was his wife or girlfriend. He said she was neither, but he also said that he was in love with her.

This revelation shocked her even more than it shocked me. The reason for this is that she was actually his happily-married secretary. We went through a very awkward moment, but I made it pass quickly by asking her to help me with my Spanish pronunciation.

We went to plenty of pubs, bars and clubs, but D.J.'s was definitely the one we spent the most time in. The owner, Steve, was very hospitable. Of course we were spending money in there like it was water. He was genuinely nice though. He let us behind the bar, he opened up early for us on Monday and he even traded shirts with Double A so they could each have a souvenir.

The real gems at D.J.'s though were the bartenders. Our two favorites were Julie and Amy. Once we became friends, it was all over for them and us. I bet Amy that she wouldn't take a shot out of her shoe. She said that if I could find 12 green balloons from outside that she would buy both of us a shot so we could "shoot the boot." I went outside and in about fifteen minutes stole 25 balloons. Needless to say, she kept her end of the bet. We had such a fun day with Amy and Julie, that even though they were supposed to work until 3 a.m., they were so drunk that they had to leave at 8 p.m.

However, Amy's part in our story does not end there. We met up with her again on Monday, our last night in the city. We went to a few bars and got really hammered. The last bar that a bunch of us went to was called Hurley's and was directly across from our hotel. After last call, we walked out into the street, only to be greeted by our friends telling us that we had been kicked out of our hotel. It had something to do with my friend, Ivan, screaming at the guy at the front desk because he wouldn't let him go upstairs and have sex in his own room.

Yeah, he was hustle, but I don't know if that was grounds for our removal. Anyway, the police were called and we all piled into Evan's Whoo Ride (big van) to leave. Thank God for Amy because she let us stay at her apartment even though her mother and her mom's boyfriend were staying there. The next thing I knew, we were on our way back to UMass.

In the midst of all this madness, Luke got kicked out of a bong store, he and Fitz #1 and #2 slept in the banquet room of one of the nicest hotels in Montreal, John slept, Jay #2 ate deodorant and Jay #1 and Evan danced half-naked for four girls from Toronto.

Now that I have shamelessly mentioned all of my friends' names, I hope you enjoyed my reminiscing. Don't forget that next Thursday is April Fool's Day.

Real opportunity

A few years ago I lived for a week in a trailer deep in the backwoods of Kentucky. I was visiting friends of the family, a missionary couple leading a small congregation in the isolated community.

I met a few of the locals on expeditions with the couple to battered little shacks down long winding roads. A common sight was a bucket of lard next to the stove — a cheap staple. People wore clothes that looked old and out-of-fashion. Not even Wal-Mart had invested in the area — a bad sign. Many of the people lived in varying degrees of poverty. Those who were eligible received welfare.

Tanya Mannes

The mining economy around Hazard, Kentucky, had dwindled, leaving a tiny job base for residents. One of the girls I met worked with her mother scraping chewing gum off school bus seats, earning minimum wage. The depression in the job market had produced a dispirited community, paralyzed by their inability to afford further education and their belief that it was hopeless to look for a job elsewhere.

The conditions were not limited to Hazard — according to the U.S. Department of Commerce, at that time, two counties in the state suffered from around 20% unemployment. Only the capital, Lexington, had a relatively low unemployment rate. The estimated median family income ranged from a poverty-line $12,200 to $36,200 in non-metropolitan counties. These statistics have changed little.

> "I think that the majority of Las Vegas employees see through the hype and glamour, taking their paychecks home and viewing the town as a place to make a living."

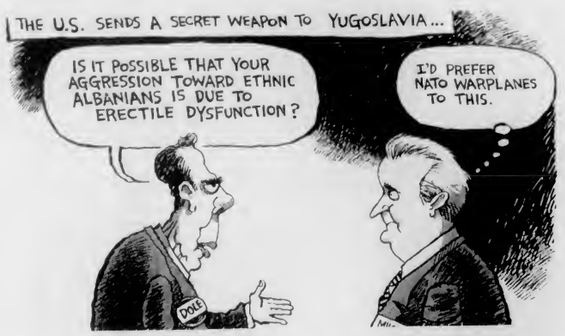
I visited Las Vegas last week for spring break and experienced the tourist town first-hand. Its economy is the antithesis of Kentucky's. Las Vegas, Nevada, has over 112,500 hotel rooms in a dazzling strip of casinos and related attractions (theme parks, wildlife preserves (including The Secret Garden of Siegfried and Roy) and restaurants). What it offers tourists is a world that revolves around them — and their money. What it offers locals is the best labor market in America, according to statistics compiled by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics and analyzed by American City Business Journals, an Internet source.

Las Vegas increased its employment base by 18.6 percent between 1992 and 1994. Adding 46,200 new jobs between 1995 and 1996 made Las Vegas' employment growth rate an astonishing 8.5 percent. Its economy is objectively stronger today than it was then. Of course, the vast majority of these jobs are service-based, from the operational level (cocktail waitress, room attendant) to the management level (banquet manager, director of guest services). This reflects America's move toward a service-based economy from a manufacturing economy.

I have read that a high proportion of high school seniors in surrounding areas of Las Vegas choose not to go to college. This is believable because opportunities abound for recent high school graduates, even those with limited experience. In general, service businesses such as hotels, casinos, restaurants, bars and spas do not require a college education for entry-level positions. Most of the employers offer job-based training. An eighteen-year-old can pull in a decent income ($400+ a week) bartending or even make $300+ a week picking up trash on the casino floor (don't ask me how I know this).

Critics see the low college entrance rate from the suburbs of Las Vegas as a problem. But this view seems to reflect a dangerous tendency to stigmatize blue-collar positions as not being "real jobs."



I observed quite a few Las Vegas employees who seemed to get a lot of satisfaction from their work. One twenty-something bartender at Stratosphere Hotel and Casino said he liked to go to all the roller coasters on the main strip for the "adrenaline rush." He appeared to be satisfied with his working conditions — a spacious bar in a glitzy, modern casino. A middle-aged hostess at the glamorous, established Golden Nugget Casino bustled about the dining room floor looking as though she considered her job important and absorbing. She greeted each guest with a proprietal air, welcoming them to "her" restaurant.

One 60-year old woman with a stunning blond, shiny wig had the job of standing by Bally's "Million Dollar Slot Pull" and chatting with guests, encouraging them to try their luck. She engaged in animated conversations with them and really seemed to enjoy the excitement of it.

On the flip side, I saw one employee cash her paycheck at the cashier stand, and sit right down at a slot machine to "invest it." But I think that the majority of Las Vegas employees see through the hype and glamour, taking their paychecks home and viewing the town as a place to make a living. Some only want a temporary job, but many of them move up in the ranks, to higher levels of responsibility and management. You can do "real work" without going to college.

As the nation moves toward a service economy, I think that this bias will dwindle. A booming economy that does not require high levels of education is a great thing. I doubt that any of the critics have ever visited Hazard, Kentucky.

What an on-campus nightclub rumored to be opening late-night next semester, and a music scene that has blossomed such renowned national acts like Dinosaur Jr. and Buffalo Tom, the UMass music scene is itching to explode. Who are those acts that are going to lead the music revolution and enliven the campus social scene? The Daily Collegian takes an exclusive peek at some of the more influential bands that are ready to strike again as a little chapter of UMass music history.

HURRICANE DAVE

This hot band has been tragedy ridden to say the least. Formed early this year in the Amherst area, Hurricane Dave was brought to life by singer-songwriter Joker Eberly's killer vocals. UM music prof talks feminism

By Melissa Clinton
Collegian Correspondent

Susan McClary, a musicology professor at UCLA, visited Mt. Holyoke College on Monday and UMass on Tuesday.

McClary is the Five College Musicologist-in-Residence. She received a Ph.D. from Harvard in 1976 and is the author of several books. Among them are Feminine Endings: Music, gender, and Sexuality and George Bizet: Carmen. She is also coeditor of The Politics of Composition and Performance and Reception.

In 1995, she was awarded a John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation Fellowship. Over the past decade, she has received much criticism for her book Feminine Endings, as well as for her lectures. Reasons for this criticism include her approach to analyzing music.

McClary, a noted feminist in her field, confronts issues of sexuality and feminism which are not commonly studied by many musicologists. Another aspect of McClary's uniqueness, is that her studies focus not only on classical music, but popular music as well. Often popular music is not studied at this level. In Endings, for instance, she discusses the role of pop-star Madonna.

At Monday's lecture at Mt. Holyoke she discussed how both classical and popular musicians address issues of feminism and sexuality in music. She started the lecture by saying that there is an ideology that "music is music" and that "it transcends sexuality and the body."

McClary then said that there is feminism in both art and poetry, so there must be in music. The problem is with how one goes about incorporating feminism in music. During the lecture, she mentioned that many popular musicians bring sexuality and feminism into their music. Examples of this, she said, would be the Lilith Fair and various music videos.

Many popular and classical musicians, McClary said, consistently incorporate feminist themes in their music even if they do not identify themselves as feminists.

She will be giving another lecture tonight at Smith College in Wright Hall Auditorium at 7:30 p.m. Her discussion will be entitled, "Soprano Masculinities (Issues in Queer Studies course)."

Grand opening for The Little Shop

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

The UMass Theatre Guild has finally found a show that matches their on-campus reputation for being wild, energetic, voracious, and, most-importantly, daring. You can witness all of these elements in their production of Little Shop of Horrors, the wickedly popular black comedy that runs tonight, tomorrow night, and Saturday night at 8 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom, with an additional matinee on Saturday at 2 p.m.

The popularity of Little Shop was just one of the many reasons for its selection as the Guild's annual Spring Musical.

"It has great music that a lot of people know, it's a lot of fun," said director Kelly Ristaino. "It's got its funny moments and its kind of sad moments. And it's action packed."

Little Shop of Horrors is the bizarre story of Seymour (played by Harry LaCoste), a dorky, clumsy worker at a down-and-out florist shop who's also hopelessly in love with his hopelessly dizzy co-worker, Audrey (Marcy Secora). Both Seymour and Audrey are poor and depressed, and working at the starving shop doesn't help. But one day, Seymour's luck strikes when he finds a strange plant that seems to appear out of nowhere. The plant immediately and magically attracts customers, and Seymour becomes instantly famous.

There is one catch, however, and that concerns the plant's choice taste for consumption — blood. From its innocent comic beginnings, Little Shop turns into a romp of dark, biting comedy and outrageous characters, like the sadistic and hilarious dentist, Orin (Gordon Bedford).

All of this fun comes at a price, and not just for Seymour, but for the cast and production crew — Little Shop is one of the most difficult shows to pull off, combining different acting styles, music, dance, and especially puppetry.

"It was challenging in a new aspect... a different direction for the Guild," said producer Ari Tepliz. "One really challenging aspect was the plant. We needed something that was both usable and looked pretty good."

After making lots of contacts, the Guild found their plant at Mohawk Regional High School, fixed it up, and found the talents of Delores Brown to provide the voice and Matt Hicks to operate it.

But the plant is just one of the elements that bring this show together.

"It's a great opportunity for cast members," said Ristaino. "We stressed the cast being an ensemble, not just one star character. We also wanted the music, singing, and acting working as one."

Achieving that ensemble effect was a meticulous process in casting and rehearsals. Out of 110 people auditioning, 21 people had to be chosen.

"The show is all about style, [so] we wanted people who were musically talented, but also willing to go overboard, to take risks in acting, to try new things," said Ristaino.

This is Ristaino's college directorial debut, although her experience in theater is not lacking. In addition to directing projects in high school, she's also an accomplished actress and singer. So far, all that talent is paying off.

"The cast is doing awesome. Tech week is going great... Everyone has been really supportive," she said.

"Everyone loves the music, everyone's seen the movie. The show is going great and it's a lot of fun," added Tepliz.

Little Shop of Horrors is also enhanced by the choreography of Kristin Stewart and the musical direction of Anthony Fors.

Little Shop of Horrors runs from tonight to Saturday at 8 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom, with a Saturday matinee at 2 p.m. Tickets are $5 and available at TIX at 545-0412.

Virtuoso Pass is Unforgettable

Few musicians are able to completely bridge the gap between their emotions and their instrument. This is especially true for contemporary guitarists, as the guitar has been thoroughly dissected and analyzed to such an extent that there has come about in the past few decades an almost prescribed way in which the instrument is played and interpreted. Among all of contemporary jazz guitarists there is only one whose playing was so technically advanced, yet intimate and personal that he earned the title "Guitar Virtuoso."

Joe Pass is this artist. In his lifetime he developed a technically virtuous, swinging sound, which was at the same time very accessible and listenable. He was highly in demand by artists looking for a complete, yet intimate sound that no other guitarist could offer.

A strong characteristic of his music was that his innate sense of voice leading and harmonic resolution was unbelievably acute, so much so that Joe never sounded stale or overly technical. His work always sounds personal — like he was able to forget the technical and theoretic nature of music and just play. In fact, the way his music sounds as if everything happens effortlessly is actually proof of his deep understanding and artistry in manipulating standard music theory. This is at the forefront of his solo works such as the "Virtuoso" series on the Pablo/Fantasy label, as well as on albums where Joe is the sole accompanist in vocal/guitar, or horn/guitar duets.

By: Charlie Apicella

Above all though, his music has the feel of spontaneity and improvisation, and he often tries a number of different aproaches within the course of a tune.

The newest addition to his catalog on the Fantasy label is a 1992 date entitled Unforgettable. On this album Joe plays in his signature unaccompanied setting on an acoustic nylon-string guitar. The focus of the album's material is more laid-back and intimate, and the tunes are full of concentrated emotion, as the longest track is only a little more than five minutes long. The material has more of a focused, almost arranged feel, and there are few times were Joe really stretches out and expands on the form or content of the tunes. The tracks are very lyrical and harmonically complex, with a refrain from any moments of jaw-dropping speed or proficiency.

For this album Pass selected a list of ballads and standards on which he could stress his softer side, rather than a list of bop or blues tunes on which his technical virtuosity would be highlighted. Some highlights of the album are a swinging, tight "Autumn Leaves" and a haunting version of "Round Midnight."

On this album, as always, Pass' musicianship shines through. His playing on this date treats the nylon-string guitar as a different instrumnet altogether than his usual archtop electric-guitar, and this change gives great insight to the natural skill and artistry of one of jazz's most complete artists.

Charlie Apicella is a UMass student.

Sleater–Kinney Rock hard

THE HOT ROCK
Sleater–Kinney
Kill Rock Stars

On their fourth full-length, The Hot Rock, Sleater–Kinney offer up a radiant platter of the harsh, intense, blindingly beautiful screech and clatter that has made them into near household names. The musicianship on the album is obvious: guitarist Carrie Brownstein spins out breathtaking herky–jerky riffs and Janet Weiss's drumwork carves out the songs with the shining precision of a new razor blade.

The Hot Rock is by no means just a straight punk record, it's an opportunity for Sleater–Kinney to stretch their musical talents and imaginations. Lead singer Corrin Tucker tones down her tradmark warbling scream in favor of a more fluid, varied vocal approach that mirrors the album's expanded musical and emotional palette, but neither Tucker nor Sleater–Kinney sacrifice passion in the name of experimentation. The Hot Rock is a searing punk album dressed up in pretty pop clothes.

The album kicks off with the oddly lovely and slightly restrained "Start Together," immediately signally the new sound. Rather than punk or grunge, "Start Together" and the album as a whole recall the bare rattle and hum of early eighties post punk/new wave acts like the first incarnations of U2 and Talking Heads. Songs like "Banned From the End of the World" would slide neatly into R.E.M.'s first EP, the spooks, melodic Chronic Town. The Hot Rock is a much warmer, more intimate record than its wiry soundscapes would suggest, owing mostly to the nakedly emotional lyrics and the expressive, intricate harmonies between lead vocalist Tucker and back-up Brownstein.

Highlights on the album include "The Size of Our Love," a brave, unfashionably direct song about losing a loved one to cancer and "Get Up," an unpredictable, spoken–wordish song that never loses its rhythm and drive.

Sleater–Kinney are sometimes criticized because they are a "feminist" punk band that doesn't talk about politics in its lyrics. Many also think that their is political defiance inherent in the fierceness of their music. But beyond all the fancy analysis, Sleater–Kinney rock. They are the latest long line of American musicians from Robert Johnson all the way up to Public Enemy and Nirvana that approach music not as a diversion or craft or art, but as a force of nature. We should mourn the fact that modern rock radio would rather play soulless, pre-packaged mall rock than music like Sleater–Kinney that has blood on its teeth and lightning in its heart. But first we should thank our lucky stars that we have them at all. A–

Seduced by "sexy" Cruel Intentions

CRUEL INTENTIONS
Directed by Roger Kumble
with Ryan Phillipe, Sarah Michelle Gellar, Reese Witherspoon
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

In perhaps the greatest marketing scheme since the creation of the WB as the teen sensation network, the producers of Cruel Intentions sold the one thing that teenagers can not refuse — sex. That's right: pure, unabashed, in your face sex.

Unlike most "teen" movies nowadays, Cruel Intentions dared to go beyond reaping the aforementioned network of its young, beautiful stars (Ok, so it did that too) and actually made a real movie with some type of coherent theme. This new take on Dangerous Liasons is so blatantly sexual and openly apathetic that the result is almost entertaining enough to equal the original.

However, Cruel Intentions is also so outrageous that it never manages to quite capture the character complexity or strange mixture of love, sex, intrigue, and power struggle, which made the Oscar winner so good.

The 90's teen twist on the movie might have updated names, but the dual plot structure has pretty much remained intact. The consummate playboy, Sebastian, makes a bet with his evil stepsister, Catherine, that he can de-virginize the pristine headmaster's daughter. At stake: Sebastian's sleek, shiny Jaguar and Catherine's promise to "#@*% your brains out." Who said gambling was an unhealthy activity for teenagers? As a side note, Catherine wants Sebastian to help "speed up the sexual awakening" of a clueless debutante, Cecile, who happened to steal Catherine's old boyfriend.

The shockingly blase attitudes of the main characters make this part of the movie extremely entertaining. The wonderfully witty exchanges between Catherine and Sebastian, their frustration with the "pedestrian" ways of others, and the gratuitous sexual innuendo is pure pleasure to watch. The movie is fast, sassy, and openly lavish. Cruel Intentions, and moreover the audience, revels in its cruel- hearted apathy and overt sexuality. We get the immediate sense that these two horny teenagers use people just like fast cars, expensive clothes, or cocaine.

However, the movie hinges on how believable it is for the seemingly heartless Sebastian to fall in love with Annette Hargrove, the subject of his naughty bet. The first half of the film is so over the top, almost to the point of being silly, that such a transition seems extremely unlikely. To a certain extent, this is true; the movie definitely lags when it tries to become "serious."

To its credit though, Cruel Intentions never completely falls apart. Reese Witherspoon is quirky, cute enough to make Sebastian's fall from sleeze–dom believable and, more importantly, human. The gentle undercurrent of male/female power struggle between the siblings also adds depth and anguish to the abrupt shift in the movie. A contest develops between the two to determine who is more shallow and vengeful.

Ryan Phillipe's intense eyes and melancholic brooding somehow make Sebastian intensely vulnerable, especially to the charms of love and to the wickedness of Catherine. Sarah Michelle Gellar, though still not quite believable as anyone other than Buffy, embodies Catherine's pure evil and utter cold-heartedness relatively well.

When each sibling tries to command control of the relationship, Catherine's twisted, power hungry, manipulative ways shine through and even a helpless Sebastian falls victim. She shames him into rejecting the only real emotion that he has ever felt.

For obvious reasons, Cruel Intentions will pay off at the box office, but then again so have most teen movies recently. Unfortunately, though, most people will see this as another example of the rampant "teen" genre parading pretty people onto the screen to make a quick buck. And maybe it is, but Cruel Intentions at least tried — with some success — to capture character complexity and the delicacy of emotion. By no means will the movie win 3 Oscars like the original Dangerous Liasons, but it is undoubtedly the most entertaining and interesting teen film to date. B

COURTESY LAURIE SPARHAM

Geoffrey Rush and Tom Wilkinson are the producers of Shakespeare's work in Shakespeare in Love.

8MM (dir Joel Schumacher, with Nicholas Cage, Joaquin Phoenix, playing at Mountain Farms) There's only one word to describe 8mm: dark. Really dark. It also has a simple, methodical plot, a solid performance from Nicholas Cage, and an even better performance from Joaquin Phoenix. As atmospheric as Seven, but not quite as compelling. B- (Adam Martignetti)

ANALYZE THIS (dir Harold Ramis, with Robert De Niro, Billy Crystal, playing at Mountain Farms) Perhaps best described as a mixture of Donnie Brasco, Goodfellas, and Naked Gun, Analyze This looks at both the comic and dark aspects of the mob movie, instead of going for all out satire, and is almost saved by the dead-on performances of Robert De Niro and Billy Crystal. De Niro plays a mob boss who needs a psychiatrist (Crystal) to help him cure his anxiety attacks. But eventually, this clever premise gets lost in a slew of lame gags and hideous "knock-knock"-caliber jokes. C+ (A.M.)

BLAST FROM THE PAST (dir Hugh Wilson, with Brendan Fraser, Alicia Silverstone, playing at Springfield Cinemas) A man born and raised in an isolated fallout shelter by parents stuck in the 50's ventures out into crazy, 90's California to find a wife. It's at once a ridiculous and interesting idea for a movie. But the film, despite the affecting performace of Brenden Fraser, is not brave enough to use its available strangeness to support much more than an ordinary boy-meets-girl-with-complications romantic comedy. C- (Rob Roensch)

LIFE IS BEAUTIFUL (dir Roberto Benigni, with Roberto Benigni, playing at Pleasant St.) There is no one happier or more energetic than Roberto Benigni, especially after winning two Oscars this past Sunday. Here's a chance to see the film he won with — a highly unusual, gorgeously filmed, hilarious, tragic two hours of entertainment and thought. Benigni basically plays himself, but he's much funnier when he speaks his native Italian, combining the influence of Chaplin and his own unique style, which culminates in facing the Holocaust. The concentration camp scenes are a bit amateurish, and Benigni can get on your nerves sometimes, but the overall effect is superb and devastating. A (Bryan McAllister)

MESSAGE IN A BOTTLE (dir Luis Mandoki, with Kevin Costner, Robin Wright Penn, playing at Springfield Cinemas) Mark Message in a Bottle "Return to sender." The Kevin Costner film has a chance to be a poetic and creative romance, but instead resorts to humdrum formulas and tired melodrama. Inept acting and hopelessly slow direction mar it further. Beautiful photography and the presence of Paul Newman are the only highlights. D (Adam Martignetti)

PAYBACK (dir Brian Helgeland, with Mel Gibson, Maria Bello, playing at Showcase, W. Springfield). Payback is a movie about violence — about guns and fights and people killing each other. But the violence is only part of the bleak world this film creates, mixing lifeless photography and a tired but strong performance by Mel Gibson. Payback sets its goals low, but hits most of them. B (R.R.)

SHAKESPEARE IN LOVE (dir John Madden, with Joseph Fiennes, Gwyneth Paltrow, playing at Academy of Music). Art and life have had a chaotic history, alternatively frustrating and inspiring each other. In Shakespeare in Love, the Bard (Joseph Fiennes) is suffering writer's block at the dawn of the first performance of the yet-unwritten Romeo and Juliet, until he finds his muse in Paltrow. Wit, enchantment, high comedy and passion follows. A marvelous supporting cast, led by Judi Dench and Geoffrey Rush, and an impeccable script, co-written by noted playwright Tom Stoppard. A (B.M.)

Is Black pop music's saviour?

By Neale Gay
Collegian Correspondent

PISTOLERO
Frank Black and the Catholics
Spin Art

Frank Black is pop music's maestro and the Catholics are his orchestra. Elvis Costello used to own this prestigious title, but he blew it after he broke up the Attractions and went solo over a decade ago. There was a time when the title was up for grabs, but the stale synth-pop and unamusing hair metal of the late eighties/early nineties wasn't interesting enough to inspire musicians and poets alike.

Music was boring, and, with the exception of the Pixies and Nirvana, few groups dared to take sound to another level. Frank Black was a Pixie, "the" Pixie. Frontman and songwriter. A lot of fans and critics haven't forgiven him for breaking up that alterna-supergroup, saying his albums haven't lived up to his former prowess. That all changes with Pistolero, the second release from Frank Black and the Catholics.

Pistolero is the best record I've heard in ages, leaving me to speculate that Black is pop music's messiah. I'm dead serious. This album is better than anything he has done since the demise of the Pixies. It rivals most of their recordings. The lyrics are accessible, only obscured with the biting feedback of guitars that sound as though they're being created and not played. This music crosses spectrums, at times sounding like the Rolling Stones, and at others, like... well, the Pixies. The tune "Skeleton Man" may resemble a cross between the Stones and the Small Faces, but "I Want Rock & Roll" sounds like the Pixies, and "85 Weeks" doesn't sound like anything I've ever heard. To sum up the album in less than ten words - rock music with incredible pop sensibility.

It's the lyrics that make the album; it's always that way with Frank Black. Some of the songs are spiteful, others are anthems, and still, others are mysterious. In the song, 'Billy Radcliffe,' Black sounds entirely empathetic for his character, who, according to Black, "saw what the Devil man saw / a spot of blue in the black of the eye of the lord... I bet you cried when he died / now didja, now didja??"

Rock music is dying. Marilyn Manson seems to think he's the anti-Christ, but I don't believe him because Johnny Rotten said the same thing in 1977 and his promises didn't result in the apocalypse. Frank Black can save us all because his songs about alien conspiracies and supernatual cults exist to please. Pistolero exceeds that goal.

In the words of Frank Black, "I'm not ashamed to say I want rock & roll." A songwriting to become much easier.

Thomson and many others beleive that their shows are an "unhonest, unprepared good time" that spreads throughout the crowd. And their fans will get many more good times when they pick up the band's limited edition, "bootleg CD" that is set to combine five unreleased studio takes from last year with four recent live tracks. They are also still presently recording in Boston for their second full-length album that is due out in May.

For Thomson, it has only been recently that he has achieved his happiest moment as a musician; when he "got the perfect guitar and amp." He adds, "getting the sound you want from your instrument and being able to play with these guys is just incredible."

SHAZZAM

Shazzam's theme of doing something different is definately their niche. The band's incorporation of many different genres has been giving them and their fans a special treat. Their deep creation of music was evident since their formation.

Shazzam's first original, "Punkadelics," combines sounds of punk rock and hard rock into a psychedelic jam only to fade back into a punk song. "Bad Vibrations" yields deep thoughts surrounding history, and "The Other Side" could be classified as jazzy punk rock.

From playing house parties to Van Meter and beyond, Shazzam, as stated by bassist Dave Pascucci "loves to play music live for people." With a demo set to be recorded, lead vocalist Chris Barriere is optimistic about the band's future. And with their belief that music is an art form, Shazzam is creating their own form of art.

SUGAR MAPLE VOODOO

"Jazz-influenced blues rock," as guitarist Blair Lazuka describes it, offers something for everyone. By giving people a good time by performing quality music, Sugar is simple sweet.

The band's deep roots in jazz has allowed them to "interact well together as musicians and people," as Lazuka states. The instrumental ballad "High" touches one spectrum of the band's talents, while the pure blues rock track, "Kittens got Claws," offers another.

After nearly a year of existence, Sugar just completed recording their debut album. Its much anticipated self-release is set for mid-April.

As the band's talent has progressed, their songwriting has become more abstract, while at the same time yielding more significance. The band attempts to go for their own sound, rather than recreating others. Therefore, as Lazuka recommends, their "music is best taken live."

TAVE HU

Tave Hu's unique fusion of folk, funk, rock and junk has put on some remarkable performances in less than a year of existence. Their unique style and ever-changing performances has struck a favorable beat in the hearts of many. It wasn't too long ago that singer-songwriter Dave Buchalter started this trio and would play anywhere from open mics to nursing homes.

The Tave Hu of today is a heavily sought after, five member strong improvisation militia with a tight, responsive sound that is on a mission to raise smiles on people's faces. Their adventerous style has been witnessed from as close as Fire & Water in Northampton to as far away as the Commercial Street Cafe in Worcester.

With their debut effort set to be recorded this summer, the band, according to Buchalter, is "entering the world of taking music seriously." With a band name that came down from Heaven to further describe an "orgasmic jam session," one must wonder if Tave Hu can actually be taken seriously. However, with Buchalter's gifted songwriting skills, Tave Hu has been able to not only be serious, but bring tears to fans' faces. If you have the privilege to take a mystical journey during a Tave show, expect the unexpected because strange things will happen.

UNCLE TRAVELING MATT

Accoustic rockers, Uncle Traveling Matt, have made quite a lasting impression on their audience since their formation earlier this year. With a groovy sound that encompasses a saxophone, the band easily captivates audiences. The band's goal, according to saxist Joe Sparkes is to "have the people really relate to the music and what the lyrics represent."

With tracks like "Puddle Jumping," "One Fine Day" and the fun "Happier," the band is doing quite well at pleasing fans. Their goal of being their own sound has driven them to experimenting with new ideas.

With no releases yet from this newly formed band, hopes are high that they will be able to show UMass how to jam.

Hurricane Dave, Tave Hu, and Joint Custody will all play Van Meter Friday night. Show starts at 7:30pm with tickets costing $3. For contact information check out www.massbands.com.

Cartoons taking over TV

Cartoons are invading the world of TV at an enormous rate. However, the word "cartoon" has taken on a whole new meaning. When I think back about twelve years to when I was six years old, the only cartoons imaginable were shows such as "Scooby Doo" and "The Smurfs."

Waking up early on a Saturday morning was a weekly ritual for me, and I can still remember some of the highlights of the much anticipated weekend entertainment. Times have changed in the past twelve years. With the advent of cartoons such as "The Rugrats," "South Park," and the most successful cartoon ever, "The Simpsons," there has been a huge revolution in animation.

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

Last year when "South Park" was introduced on Comedy Central, there was a huge amount of revenue made from merchandise marketed during the show. The sitcom also gained the highest single show ratings in Comedy Central's short history. Since then, its lewd content has caught up with "South Park," causing it to lose it to lose its spark, and it's ratings. It is ironic that the show's highest amount of viewers are now children ages 12-15, who simply should not be watching.

Nevertheless, One cable cartoon is still flourishing. "The Rugrats" is the not only the highest rated cable show in history, but it is also the single most important element for cable's top rated station over the past four years, Nickelodeon.

Starting this Sunday, FOX releases an all new type of cartoon entitled "Futurama," which is produced by the creators of "The Simpsons." The new series hopes to gain prosperity the same way that "The Simpsons" has in the past. "Simpsons" creator, Matt Groening, who's previous work was done on "The Tracy Ulman Show" in the late 1980's has designed "Futurama" to look, sound, and give off the same feelings that "The Simpsons" made so popular.

There has been very little press released, or advertising done for "Futurama" besides commercials aired on FOX which simply brag that the show is brought to you by the same people who bring "The Simpsons" into our homes every week. The desired effect of such a limited promotional tactic is obvious. FOX wants people to immediate assume that "Futurama" is "The Simpsons Part Two" and will watch it because of that. Most of the time this does not work, but in the case of "Futurama," it will be a hit. "The Simpsons" is such a perfect comedy series, that there is no way "Futurama" can miss. Even if it does not live up to the expectations set by its predecessor, it will still gain a huge viewing audience. Personally, as someone who has never missed an episode of "The Simpsons" in its entire nine year run, I can honestly say that I am eagerly awaiting the premier of "Futurama" this Sunday night at 8:30p m.

"Futurama" is not the only new cartoon sitcom to join the ranks of "The Simpsons." After the Super Bowl, last January, FOX aired the hands down, best new series of the 1998 — 1999 season: "The Family Guy." There's no doubt in my mind, I'll take a show about a guy who gets all of his advice from his talking dog, and has a baby son with the intellect of a Harvard graduate, and is obsessed with murdering his mother, over "Felicity" any day. Call me immature.

Now, before you get your pens ready to write the letter to the Collegian telling them that I am too crazy to be writing a column on TV, allow me to explain. The bottom line with "Family Guy" is it can make you laugh without really trying. The jokes tend to be extremely subtle, and the animated characters (however messed up they may be) seem to have an ability to make their lines flow nicely, to give a reality to things that are very, very fake. In the series debut of "Family Guy" there was even a triumphant return of the kool-aid guy as he busts through the wall of a court room.

The only thing about "Family Guy" that is obvious is that its writers are crazy. The ideas brought forth on the show are borderline insane, but all out hilarious. The only way to judge this gem of a sitcom is to take a watch for yourself. The official series premier of "Family Guy" is on Sunday, April 11th at 8:30 p.m., which will be its regular time slot.

The sad news was announced to the TV world this week as it was reported that David Strickland, a character on the once popular NBC series, "Suddenly Susan" committed suicide by hanging himself in a Las Vegas hotel room. Strickland did not leave a suicide note, and no reason has been reported as to why he killed himself, however his death has forced production on "Suddenly Susan" to be temporarily stopped.

Finally, there is some more news reported as to how shows are shaping up their season finales. As I reported a few weeks ago, the season finale of "Party of Five" will involve Julia (Neve Campbell) engaging in a lesbian relationship. FOX said that the season finale will also be the opportunity for them to take Jennifer Love Hewitt's character, Sarah, off of the show, and enter her into her spin-off which will start next season.

"Friends" is gearing up for a two part season finale, as they had last year, and along with my good friend and correspondent, Kristin, I have come up with a little advice for the creators of "Friends": After you're done gearing up for a season finale, gear up for the Emmy for Best Comedy Series, because this is the year, "Friends" has never been better.

NBC announced that Janeane Garafolo will be the special guest for the final episode of "Mad About You" which, along with "Home Improvement" and "The Nanny," is in its final season.

Rowell has devoted his life to programming original wind band music, and with this concert, he explains, "I chose to honor an essential musical component for students, as well as the pieces themselves and the composers who wrote them. All of these composers have made major contributions to the development of the end band. This is core literature."

Some of the pieces to be performed include March, Op. 99 by Sergei Prokvofiev, Second Suite in F by Gustav Holst and John Philip Sousa's Glory of the Yankee Navy.

Women's crew has solid season opener in Ireland

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

It was very easy to get the picture of what spring break was like for the Massachusetts women's crew team.

Just by talking to captain Neyla Leslie and coach Jim Dietz, one could tell that the past week, which was also the season opener for the 1999 squad, was simply a blast.

That term, though, is an understatement for Amy Lawless, who, in her second year with the Minutewomen, showed her folks back home what UMass crew was all about in leading her squad to victory.

The Minutewomen swept through the varsity and JV eight events and also cruised to a couple of runner-up finishes in the open four and intermediate four.

"It's just a warmup," said Leslie, a member of the varsity eight and open four teams. "We won the first place easily."

Indeed, it was easy, and certainly it had served the purpose. As Dietz had wished, the Minutewomen launched into their season together.

"[The race] has helped us in a psychological standpoint," Dietz said. "Good bonding effort [by] the women. They really [came] together."

Added Leslie: "We get to know each other. We [became] much closer."

In the varsity eight, the UMass varsity team saw its first international competition from University of Dublin, Trinity College, and many other European institutions. Even though the Irish national team didn't show up, the Minutewomen still had the chance to show the world their incredible strength.

Lawless and Leslie led the varsity boat to a convincing first place finish by beating the second place team by nearly a minute.

The JV boat posted a time of 15:21.1 and took the crown in JV race. In fact, the JV boat could have come in second if they had raced in the varsity competition, as they were only 20 seconds behind the first boat.

Lawless and Leslie also teamed up with two other crucial members of varsity eight team, Sarah Pollmann and Tamara Saratilic, and came in second of the open four race (16:40.7) only eight ticks behind NUI Galway boat.

In the intermediate four, experienced coxswain Sara Pragluski directed a young group of troops, such as Heather Walker and Julie Vander Ploeg, to a second place finish in a time of 17:19, just four seconds behind the top finishing Neptune team.

The second team, led by veteran coxswain Christine DeRunk, sank to sixth with a time of 17:56.9.

The Minutewomen will open up their schedule back in the United States this weekend when they will host Boston College, Boston University and the University of New Hampshire on Saturday morning.

MSU may have an even brighter future in store

By Kathy Barks Hoffman
Associated Press

LANSING, Mich. — Michigan State is hoping to beat Duke and then either Connecticut or Ohio State for the NCAA basketball championship.

But even if top-ranked Duke sends the Spartans packing Saturday night, Michigan State fans can take heart. With only three players graduating and some hot new prospects headed for campus, another NCAA run next year looks likely.

"A lot depends on who leaves from this team," said Bob Gibbons, who ranks college recruits at All Star Sports Publications in Lenior, N.C. "But from a talent standpoint, they could be even stronger next year than this year."

Assistant athletic director John Farina said he's upbeat about next year's team, even as he's hoping this year's team wins the national title.

"The future does look pretty bright," he said. "With the number of key players coming back and the incoming class rated in the top 10, it appears things will be good."

Seniors Antonio Smith, Jason Klein and Thomas Kelley are the only three players who definitely won't be returning. Junior Mateen Cleaves, the team's first-team All American, has not decided whether to return for his senior year or go to the pros.

But even Cleaves' defection would be partly offset by the strength of new recruits, Gibbons said.

He points to newcomers such as Jason Richardson, a 6-foot-6 forward at Saginaw Arthur Hill, who received the Mr. Basketball award Monday and will join the Spartans next season. Last fall, Gibbons ranked Richardson eighth among recruits nationally.

Another new force next fall will be Mike Chappell, a 6-foot-9 forward from Southfield Lathrup High who transferred to Michigan State last summer after playing for Duke two years. He'll still have two years of eligibility left.

Also on the team next year will be freshmen Jason Andreas, a 6-foot-10 center from Sugar Creek, Ohio, and Adam Wolfe, a 6-foot-8 forward from Westerville South High School in Ohio. Redshirt David Thomas, a 6-foot-7 swingman, will play as a junior next year.

And the Spartans will still have 3-point whiz A.J. Granger, bench star Morris Peterson and starters Andre Hutson and Charlie Bell on the roster.

Even if the Spartans don't win any more games in the NCAA tournament, making it to the Final Four will help coach Tom Izzo and his staff recruit more top prospects, Gibbons said.

"You can't put a market value on how that means in exposure and with future recruits. Every kid in Michigan has now got to be dreaming of being a Spartan," he said.

Michigan State is in the same position Michigan was in the early 1990s, when the Fab Five had every high school basketball player mimicking their baggy shorts and longing to wear maize and blue, Gibbons said.

"Michigan State was really unable to break through" in recruiting those years, he said. "Michigan had such a stranglehold on the top prospects in your state. It was a great imbalance there."

All that has changed. The Wolverines finished 12-19, missing a postseason berth for the first time since 1983.

And Izzo's years of recruiting in Michigan's shadow are over, at least for now.

"It's noteworthy that the Spartans are now the dominant recruiting school in Michigan," Gibbons said.

That could help them in future years pull in Marcus Taylor of Waverly High School near Lansing, now ranked among the top juniors in the country. Or young up-and-comers such as Robert Whaley of Benton Harbor and Kelvin Torbert of Flint Northwestern, he said.

"Michigan State has had an outstanding recruiting class this year," Gibbons said. "It could be the beginning of not going every 20 years to the Final Four but much more often."

Playground legends may face off in NCAA national championship

AUGUSTA, Ga. (AP) — The rims at Big Oak Park are thicker and two inches higher than normal, and jumpers from the corner are often blocked by a low-hanging pine tree that is always considered in play.

The aging concrete slab has no out-of-bounds lines, free throw lines or 3-point lines and it's full of cracks that make life difficult for ballhandlers. Avoid all those obstacles and there are, defenders who pound anyone going to the hoop.

This is where Ricky Moore and William Avery learned the skills that propelled them to a state title at near-by Westside High and college stardom. Now, the one-time teammates and neighbors are on opposite sides of the Final Four, one game from playing each other for the NCAA championship.

"Most of the time if you were just an ordinary player and you didn't know many people out there and if you lost, you'd probably go home, because there was no chance that you'd get back on the court," said Moore who will start at shooting guard for Connecticut Saturday against Ohio State. "You had guys coming from all over Augusta to play at Big Oak."

Avery, who lives down the street from Moore, runs the point for Duke, which plays Michigan State and is favored to win the tournament.

If Duke and UConn advance to Monday night's final, Avery and Moore will be facing each other in an organized game for the first time.

Avery said that even at Big Oak, he and Moore would rarely guard each other, although their one-on-one battles after practice are legendary at Westside.

"We're real good friends, but we've never competed against each other — not even on the playground have we been on opposite teams," Avery said. "It would be different. We know each other so well, each of us would probably be able to stop each other right away because we know what the other one is going to do."

Avery is thought to be the better outside shooter. As a sophomore, he patrolled the perimeter for Westside while Moore did most of the penetrating. They led the Patriots to a 33-1 record and the 1995 Class AAA state title.

Avery honed his stroke at Big Oak, not the most friendly shooter's court, with the low branches and the high, stiff rims — adjusted to discourage damaging dunks.

Things are even tougher inside during brutal games of "21." No one calls fouls, meaning you score or you lose the ball, no matter how hard you get hit.

This is where Moore learned his slashing style, and his trademark defense. Former coach Ken Wright said Moore probably developed his quickness trying to get out of the way of older brother Otis, who played tight end at Clemson.

"Ricky was probably the best all-around ballplayer I've ever coached, and William was probably the best offensive player I've ever seen," said Wright, who now coaches in Gatlinburg, Tenn. "There was no way to stop them both. And they both worked so hard, that they pushed each other."

Wright remembers Moore getting up at 5 a.m. to work out before school, then "playing like it was a game in practice."

"Then, since he had a single mom, he would go out and work a part-time job after practice," Wright said.

Avery, who went to prep school for his senior year to prepare academically for Duke, worked just as hard.

"I remember catching him out at 11 one night, well past curfew," Wright said. "He was out on the court, working on his moves."

Role players helped OSU to Final Four

By Rusty Miller
Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — Don't tell Ohio State it's little more than two stars and a faceless supporting cast.

Ken Johnson, for one, bristles when he hears the words "rule player."

"I don't like that word," he said. "This is a team. I don't really feel one person or three people can win a game. It's all a collective effort."

Coach Jim O'Brien has two outstanding players in Scoonie Penn and Michael Redd, but they are not the only pieces in the puzzle.

"We have a collection of guys who do a couple of things pretty well and have some limitations," he said. "Where you have a gain, sometimes you have a loss. So you just have to keep weighing the trades."

When Ohio State plays Connecticut in the national semifinals on Saturday night, the players in the background might well decide the outcome. And their parts are clearly defined:

The Mop-up Man

Jason Singleton seldom wanders far from the basket on offense, unless it's to set a crunching pick or to set up a teammate with a pass.

Asked about a 15-foot jumper he hit earlier in the season, the 6-foot-5 senior said he couldn't remember ever shooting that far from the hoop.

He almost always draws the toughest defensive assignment from the opposing frontline.

"His importance has not really been appreciated enough by people outside the coaching staff," O'Brien said.

"Jason, he's like the Robin of our team," said Penn, who along, with Redd, is its Batman. "He does all our dirty work."

The Shot-blocker

A year ago, during an 8-22 season the Buckeyes were forced to play zone every game because they couldn't keep up with fast point guards and Johnson was constantly in foul trouble, trying to block every shot.

The addition of Penn, who sat out his transfer year from Boston College, has shored up the perimeter defense. And Johnson, a 6-11 junior, has picked his spots and has been a major factor in Ohio State's remarkable turnaround to a 27-8 record.

In the South Regional final win over St. John's, he swatted seven shots.

"Ken Johnson and Jason Singleton have been playing phenomenal for us," said Redd, the Buckeyes' leading scorer. "They haven't been recognized until now. But it's a great combination."

Johnson seldom takes an ill-advised shot, yet scored 12 points against St. John's. But nobody talks about his offense.

The Defender

How many other teams dramatically change their starting lineup after 31 games? That's what O'Brien did when he inserted freshman Brian Brown in place of Ian Sanderson before the NCAA first-round game with Murray State.

Brown handles the ball, allowing Penn and Redd to scissor through picks for open shots or beat defenders backdoor. He also guards the top perimeter threat, shielding the Buckeyes' big two from foul trouble and fatigue.

"Scoonie and Mike, they've been carrying this team all season long offensively," Brown said. "But Scoonie and Mike couldn't be here without us."

The Minutemen

When O'Brien needs someone to muscle the other team's big man, he can call on the broad-shouldered Sanderson. If the offense is stagnant, he brings in 6-7 junior-college transfer George Reese.

Senior Neshaun Coleman is the team's 3-point specialist and freshman Boban Savovic spells the guards and has broken open a couple of games with perimeter shooting.

O'Brien says it's been easy to align the parts and keep everyone happy. No one can argue with the result.

"We have an egoless collection of guys for the most part," he said. "Everyone has an ego, but it has never been a problem with these guys to understand who the marquee players are. That's a tribute to our team."

Notes from the diamond

The Cincinnati Reds put Denny Neagle and two other pitchers on the disabled list yesterday and temporarily dropped Pete Harnisch from the rotation because of back spasms.

The Reds will enter the season with questions about their top two starters and uncertainty about one of their more dependable setup men in the bullpen.

Neagle has been slowed this spring by pulled leg muscles and weakness in his shoulder. Harnisch had his outing on Sunday cut short by spasms on the left side of his back and will rest for a few days before trying to throw again.

"I'm getting to the point where I feel better and better," Neagle said in Sarasota, Fla. "My velocity is back."

The Reds also put reliever Stan Belinda and starter Scott Winchester on the 15-day disabled list yesterday. Belinda has biceps tendinitis, a problem unrelated to his multiple sclerosis. Winchester is making a comeback from shoulder surgery last August.

• At Fort Myers, Fla., the Boston Red Sox said Nomar Garciaparra's ailing right elbow should heal completely and he should resume playing shortstop soon.

"Don't panic," Boston team physician Dr. Arthur Pappas said. "I think Nomar will be fine, and we'll have him back in the lineup, and he'll play the way he always plays, very well."

Garciaparra, the 1997 AL Rookie of the Year, hasn't played shortstop in the team's last 11 exhibition games, although he has been a designated hitter in some of them.

He had an MRI on Monday and was examined by Los Angeles Clippers physician Dr. Tony Daly. On Tuesday, he was examined by Anaheim Angels physician Dr. Lewis Yocum, who spoke with Pappas.

"The main ligament on the inside of the elbow seemed perfectly fine," Pappas said before yesterday night's game with the Minnesota Twins. "One of the muscles coming from the area has a little inflammation and I expect that will quiet down."

• At Port Charlotte, Fla., Darryl Strawberry gave himself a big boost in his quest to be with the New York Yankees on opening day. Strawberry hit a tiebreaking single in the ninth inning and drove in three runs in an 8-6 win over the Texas Rangers.

Still undergoing chemotherapy as part of his recovery from colon cancer surgery last October, Strawberry has yet to make a start in left field.

The Yankees aren't sure he'll be ready to play by opening day and may want to keep him on a minor league roster, which would shield his $2.5 million salary from baseball's luxury tax until he's brought up to the majors.

• At Tempe, Ariz., Ken Griffey Jr. homered twice and drove in four runs, and Jay Buhner and Russ Davis also homered off knuckleballer Steve Sparks in the third and fifth innings.

Davis has six homers this spring, while Griffey has four and Buhner four.

"I felt great today," Sparks said. "Except for four or five pitches, I was locked in. But that's part of the game. I have to make those pitches. They were hitting the ball hard. I needed to keep the ball down."

In other games:

• Blue Jays 4, Phillies 3, 10 innings

At Dunedin, Fla., Kevin Witt drove in the winning run with a two-out single in the 10th, then was optioned to Triple-A. Peter Munro got the victory despite walking two straight and giving up the go-ahead run in the 10th.

• Indians 10, Dodgers 2

At Vero Beach, Fla., Jim Thome, Travis Fryman and rookie Alex Ramirez homered in Cleveland's first visit to Dodgertown. Dave Burba allowed two runs and six hits in five innings, giving up an RBI single to Jose Vizcaino in the third and a pinch-homer to Dave Hansen in the fifth. Steve Karsay finished with one-hit relief for a save.

• Reds 5, Devil Rays 4

At Sarasota, Steve Avery gave up homers to Randy Winn, Joe Oliver and Bubba Trammell, but Norm Charlton's three walks helped Cincinnati rally. The Devil Rays committed three errors and Aaron Boone, the Reds' third baseman, committed two in one inning.

Cardinals 5, Expos 3

• At Jupiter, Fla., Joe McEwing hit a two-run homer, helping send Montreal to its sixth straight loss. Winner Kent Mercker allowed one run — unearned — and four hits in four innings and struck out five.

• Marlins 7, Astros 1

At Kissimmee, Fla., Todd Dunwoody hit a three-run homer and Brian Meadows combined with three relievers on a five-hitter.

Guards set for the Final Four

By Fred Goodall
Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — Ball-handling and running the offense are part of the job. The point guards at the Final Four drive their teams emotionally, too.

Mateen Cleaves guides Michigan State, Scoonie Penn carries Ohio State, Khalid El-Amin leads Connecticut and Duke dominates with William Avery implementing Mike Krzyzewski's game plan.

"This tournament has as good a four point guards as I've seen in a long time. They all may do different things, but the common ground for them is they all run their teams and have the respect of the other players," Michigan State's Tom Izzo said yesterday during a conference of the coaches bringing teams to Tropicana Field.

Cleaves and Penn shared Big Ten player of the year honors. El-Amin does whatever is necessary to help Connecticut win, and Krzyzewski says Avery has improved in his first year as a starter as much as any point guard he's ever had.

"As much as us coaches think we feel on the sidelines, somebody out on the court can feel the pulse of a team and the other team and react instinctively to that feel," Krzyzewski said of the role of the point guard. "If you have a good one, it makes you look great."

None of the floor leaders among the finalists leads his team in scoring, but there's no question where the Blue Devils, Buckeyes, Huskies and Spartans look for guidance in tight situations.

"Very simply, the people who have the ball in their hands the most time end up controlling the game. That's kind of a simple explanation of why all four of us, I'm sure, are here," said Connecticut coach Jim Calhoun.

"Clearly in our case, Khalid has been our energizer. He was 0-for-12 against Gonzaga and yet down the stretch still was the guy who made the difference... He makes us go, not only physically but psychologically. He really truly is the guy the kids turn to for energy, for direction, and sometimes for courage. He's that type of player."

So, too, is Penn.

The 5-foot-10 junior accompanied coach Jim O'Brien to Ohio State from Boston College two years ago and averaged just over 17 points and four assists for the Buckeyes after sitting out last season.

"It's a coaching cliche, but he really is somebody who's coaching the guys," O'Brien said. "If I just sat there and kept my mouth shut, you know things would get done the way you want them to be done because of Scoonie's knowledge of what should get done."

Calhoun looks at Penn, who the Huskies are familiar with from his days in the Big East, and sees a lot of El-Amin, and vice versa. He said both players have a rare ability to make everyone around them better.

"You call it charisma, you call it energy, you call it leadership, you call it competitiveness. Those are attributes they both have and are able to impart to their teammates. That's a very, very unusual characteristic to have, not only in sport but in life," Calhoun said.

Cleaves averaged 11.7 points and 7.1 assists to help Michigan State with the Big Ten title. An erratic shooter, he makes up for it by getting others involved offensively and by spearheading the team's defense.

Izzo can't imagine where the Spartans would be without him.

"There's no secret his shot is missing in action one in a while, but the rest of his game," Izzo said without completing the sentence. "When he turns up the defense, it seems like the rest of the players react."

Lefty hurlers have a special place in baseball

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

Graeme Lloyd sneaks a peek at a reporter's notebook, asking about each set of initials on the page.

"Who's this? Ken Griffey? Sure."

"Rafael Palmeiro? Yeah."

"Mo Vaughn? Of course."

The newly acquired Toronto reliever rolls his eyes. He's all too familiar with those guys.

"In this job," he says, "you get the biggest, hairiest left-handers around."

Call them the one-out wonders, these lefty specialists. Pitchers like Paul Assenmacher, Jesse Orosco, Dan Plesac and Lloyd, are relievers who have built careers stopping the most dangerous hitters in baseball, often one batter at a time.

"If you want to win," Texas general manager Doug Melvin said,"you have to have them."

Just look at Lloyd. In the last three years, he pitched in 13 postseason games for the New York Yankees, helping them win the World Series twice. His totals: eight innings, two hits, no runs.

That's why Melvin brought Tony Fossas to spring camp. Fossas is 41, had a 5.96 ERA last year and got cut by two teams. He was released by the Rangers yesterday.

But Griffey is just 3-for-24 against him with seven strikeouts. With that kind of success and a high demand for lefty relievers, Fossas may not be searching for a job for long.

"Tony Fossas. How can you say it any better?" Yankees interim manager Don Zimmer said. "Great guy, but if he hit you in the face, he couldn't knock your glasses off.

"He throws that sidearm slurve and left-handers bail out and fall on their face," he said.

Fossas grins at the description.

"A lot of left-handers come and go, but when you go into Yankee Stadium, when you have to face Tino Martinez and Paul O'Neill in the eighth inning and there are 40,000 people going crazy, you have to have a cold heart," he said. "Jesse Orosco and Dan Plesac would tell you the same thing. In the last 10 years, the importance of the left-handed specialist has really increased."

All over the majors, there are lefties who average less than an inning per outing. They include: Atlanta's John Rocker, Milwaukee's Mike Myers, Oakland's Buddy Groom, Tampa Bay's Scott Aldred, Minnesota's Eddie Guardado and St. Louis' Lance Painter.

While specialists often are a bit older and rely on breaking balls, there are exceptions.

Detroit rookie Sean Runyan led the majors with 88 appearances, yet pitched only 50 1-3 innings. In 25 games, he faced only one batter, usually depending on his 90-plus mph fastball.

"That's really your whole job, every night. That's your one job, is getting that guy," Runyan said. "Hopefully, I'll be able to play as long as guys like Assenmacher and Orosco and be as successful as they've been."

To many, Tony La Russa and his longtime pitching coach, Dave Duncan, are responsible for the increase in these specialists. They always kept a couple of lefties in Oakland, be it Rick Honeycutt or Greg Cadaret or Curt Young. When La Russa moved to St. Louis, he made sure he brought Honeycutt, too.

"I think the role we played in this has been exaggerated," the Cardinals manager said. "You look back at what Dick Williams did in Oakland in the 1970s. He had guys like Darold Knowles and Paul Lindblad in that position.

"The one thing I think we did was figure out how to use those guys more frequently. We figured that if you minimized the number of pitches they threw — one batter, mostly — you could use them three straight nights if you needed to."

Which is no fun for big boppers like Vaughn.

In recent years, he could count on seeing Lloyd (3-for-16 lifetime) and Plesac (1-for-9, four strikeouts) in the late innings.

"Their job is stopping you, keeping you from making something happen," Anaheim's new slugger said. "That one key at-bat could be the difference."

Barry Bonds, meanwhile, can plan on facing Chuck McElroy. The San Francisco star is just 2-for-30 with six strikeouts against the Colorado lefty, though he did homer off him last year.

Red Sox finally open year with a quiet camp

All is quiet on the spring training front, leaving many bewildered Sox fans scratching their heads in confusion. Usually, the scene down in Florida is one tinged with controversies and fiascos that make a Boston sports columnist's job much easier.

This season, however, the antics that normally define Red Sox spring training are nowhere to be seen. There's no Mo Vaughn to question management's dedication to winning, no Roger Clemens to mysteriously disappear from camp due to sputtering contract negotiations and no Wade Boggs to fall out of the passenger side of his truck.

Instead, the Sox have a ballclub that is preparing for the upcoming season. That's it.

The closest brush with controversy occurred when an employee showed up to work wearing a No. 42 jersey. He was asked not to wear the jersey again. Not exactly material for a scandalous headline.

Dan Duquette's customary look of anguish while addressing the media has been replaced with a gleeful visage. The man is giddy, freed at last from contract squabbles and players with scheduled court appearances. Finally, Duquette can talk to reporters about just baseball.

It's quiet, it's peaceful, it's serene — it's boring.

The Boston Red Sox have always been a team tainted with scandal riddled with controversy, paralyzed by misfortune. All of this, of course, goes back to Babe Ruth. In 1920, Sox owner Harry Frazee sold the slugger to the New York Yankees — a move that spawned the infamous "Curse of the Bambino".

But as much as the average citizen of Red Sox Nation moans and groans about the dreaded Curse, admit it. Fans thrive off the superstition. They relish in the controversy. In a weird, twisted way, Red Sox fans embrace our loser status in Major League Baseball. It's what sets us apart from the rest.

This season's mundane training camp provides us with a glimpse of every other team in the league. What is abnormal to us is customary to them. After watching 20 straight news reports from Fort Myers that feature meaningless spring training games and Duquette swaggering around the field, things are getting just a tad monotonous.

Boston fans aren't used to this. Some of us might even go so far as to wish for a controversy or two. It makes life interesting.

Whenever the Sox make the playoffs, Bostonians torture themselves by dredging up the ghosts of the past. How many times have you seen the infamous footage of the ball darting through Bill Buckner's legs? Or heard loyal Sox fans refer to Bucky [expletive] Dent?

It's no fun to think that the home team lost because the players are lousy or the clubhouse has no talent. But a curse? Hey, now that's the stuff that keeps talk radio in business. The Curse of the Bambino has become the veritable El Nino of the Red Sox fandom. When the going gets tough, blame it on the Curse.

Anything and everything pertaining to the Red Sox can, with a little stretch of the imagination, be linked to the Curse.

When the Sox made the playoffs last season, WBZ's Bob Lobel managed to connect the lottery to the Babe. The numbers 3-3-3-3 came up... Ruth's number was 3. A sign from above or a mere attempt to heighten the drama?

And who could forget when, in the midst of the controversy over whether to pitch Pedro Martinez or Peter Schourek, Dan Shaughnessy of the Boston Globe cleverly created the anagram PETER SCHOURE=RUTH KEEP SCORE.

An omen? Paranoia? Who knows? More importantly, these eerie coincidences give Sox fans something to talk about.

The standard Red Sox fan is characterized by a bizarre mixture of hope and caution, confidence and anxiety. We are gluttons for punishment that are nationally known for our incessant blubbering, wailing, whining, paranoia, and superstition. We drown in a deluge of our own self-pity, but would we really have it any other way?

Say hell freezes over and the Sox win a World Series. Sox fans will party in the streets, break out the champagne, taunt the Yanks, and celebrate the lifting of the Curse.

Then what? After a year of hoopla, it's over. Done. The curse-stricken calamity-prone Red Sox become the generic Red Sox, just another run-of-the-mill baseball team.

It's only a matter of years before the Sox relocate. If we lose Fenway Park and the Curse, the Red Sox lose their identity, and in the process, our unique brand of fandom will be relegated to the history books.

Every spring, Red Sox fans desperately cling to the hope that this season is the season. But maybe, just maybe, there is a minuscule part of every fan that wouldn't mind waiting just one more year.

the sixth to put UMass ahead 6-5. The Minutemen would then get their final two runs of the game courtesy of a Holy Cross error.

The Crusaders would attempt to make a comeback in the top of the seventh against UMass freshman reliever Brian Hourigan. Holy Cross scored a pair of runs to trim the Minutemen lead to a run at 8-7, but fellow classmate Jesse Santos spelled Hourigan and slammed the door shut on any HC rally.

The Chelmsford product rebounded from a shaky relief appearance against Providence on Tuesday to toss a perfect seventh inning. In the process, Santos struck out two and picked up his first collegiate save.

Mazzaferro, the reigning Atlantic 10 Player of the Week, led the Massachusetts offensive attack with two hits and three runs scored. The Leominster native also knocked in a run.

Cleanup hitter Aaron Braunstein drove home three runs for the Minutemen, while senior catcher Samela added two RBI. Junior first baseman Kevin O'Connell also chipped in two hits, an RBI and a run scored in the victory.

The Minutemen will look to creep over the .500 mark for the first time this season when they take on a struggling Yale squad this weekend. The two teams will play a doubleheader on Saturday afternoon at Yale Field in West Haven, Conn. before returning to Amherst on Sunday afternoon for a single contest. Game time for both days is set at noon.

Junior outfielder Steve Asadoorian scored a run in UMass' 8-7 victory over Holy Cross yesterday afternoon in Worcester.

Title fight leaves much to be desired; Lewis definitely the clear–cut winner

Robbery. That is the only way to describe what happened in Madison Square Garden on March 14. The unification bout between IBF and WBA champion Evander Holyfield and Lennox Lewis, who holds the WBC championship belt.

The fight went the full 12 rounds, and in most of them Lewis dominated the heavily favored Holyfield. In the end, however, the bout was called a draw.

Anyone that saw this fight new that it was clearly won by Lewis. Throughout the fight, the underdog remained elusive, as he evaded Holyfield's punches while connecting on his own.

Lawrence Redford

Prior to the fight Holyfield made the prediction: "I'll knock him out in the third". As the third round came and went, Lewis was still standing and connecting frequently with his punches. Then, in the infamous fifth round, Lewis went on the offensive, throwing a solid right hand that landed flush on Holyfield's left cheek. This blow sent Holyfield to the ropes, where Lewis proceeded to throw a four punch combo that staggered Holyfield. For the better part of the fifth round, Lewis was in total control.

Lewis was now in the driver seat, as Holyfield was indeed hurt by the onslaught of punches by Lewis in the fifth frame. Lewis at this point, though, tightened up because he knew — along with everyone else in attendance — that he was ahead on points.

Switching gears into cruise control eventually cost Lewis. He did not win rounds eight, nine, 10, and 11 on any of the three judges' score cards. This wound up costing Lewis his shot at unifying all three heavyweight belts.

The judges for the bout were Larry O'Connell of the United Kingdom, Stanley Christodoulou from South Africa and Eugenia Williams of the United States.

Since Lewis also hails from Great Britain, you would have thought O'Connell would have called the bout in favor of him.

Wrong. In fact, O'Connell was overly critical of Lewis, perhaps fearing that he would be seen as being biased. O'Connell called the bout a draw scoring it 115 to 115. After the match, O'Connell gave an interview with the British press stating that he had made a mistake and Lewis had actually won.

Christoudoulou is the only judge that comes out clean in my book. He called the fight close but in favor of Lewis, 116 to 113.

Williams scored the fight 115–113 in favor of Holyfield. She obviously was not watching the same fight as everyone else in Madison Square Garden, or at home on pay per view. Perhaps she should have been at home watching it on TV instead of from her view-obstructed seat at MSG.

At home she could have had a clear line of sight of the beating Holyfield was dealt at the hands Lewis. To compound her poor judging skills, Williams also stated after the fight that she saw Holyfield land more punches than Lewis.

According to the ever reliable CompuBox (which counts the number of punches thrown and landed by each fighter), not only did Holyfield throw less punches, but Lewis landed almost three times as many punches as his counterpart threw. For a fighter to land three times as many punches as the other throws and not win is unheard of.

While the decision of this fight still being deemed a draw, the decision has cast a cloud over the world of boxing. An official inquiry has been launched into the outcome of the fight, but while there is little that can be done, an effort is being made.

Now, only a week after this fight took place, a rematch has already been scheduled to take place sometime in early September.

However, to state it plain and simple, Lennox Lewis was robbed in the ring, and those boxing fans who paid $49.95 to see the fight on pay per view were robbed too.

things we have been dealing with is some of the pressure that we have been putting on ourselves, and I think Laura has played really well for us and has played a great leadership role," McClellan said. "And it was to the point where she was putting so much pressure on herself that we needed to take some of that off."

Stephanie Pavlick

Offensively, the Minutemen played really well, and were led by the play of senior midfielder Anderson. McClellan felt that her senior really stepped up her leadership role, as well as providing a good deal of the team's scoring.

"One of things going into this game that I asked her to do was to provide leadership in the midfield and she did that. She was having fun out there, and that shows in the score. The play of her and Rebecca (Minaker), the 'Dynamic Duo' out there today dictated the pace," McClellan said.

Defensively for the Minutewomen, it was a strong team effort, as they kept the Catamounts' attackers away from the home cage for a good portion of the game and gave up only 20 shots, of which only 10 were serious scoring chances.

The effort was made more spectacular due to the fact that junior defensive leader Colleen Wales couldn't play due to a knee injury suffered Saturday against New Hampshire. The second string defense stepped-up their effort in response.

"It was awesome today. We got a lot out of our second string defenders — especially with Colleen out, she is a key player out there — and our second string defense has really been stepping it up," Young said. "We work so well together you can't even tell one of our biggest defenders is missing."

The team also looks to have hit its stride heading into one of their most important contests of the season against Syracuse on Saturday afternoon at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse, NY.

"It was nice to get everybody in the game and both goalies played awesome. The bench played awesome, and they got to show what they can do," Anderson said. "We got to work on our plays and our defense. We got to do a lot of different things today."

Kevin Appier had arm trouble and will look like a batting practice pitcher. He may get traded to Boston. Record 50–112.

5. Chicago White Sox: this team was crappy enough before it lost Belle and Robin Ventura. No hitting and no pitching equals no winning. Serves Jerry Reinsdorf right. Record 49–113.

AL West Prediction:

1. Anaheim Angels: Mo Vaughn is going to make this team sick. Sick! Their hitting is going to be unreal. Tim Salmon, Darin Erstad, UMass alumnus Gary DiSarcina and Jim Edmonds. Their starting pitching needs a little a work, but Troy Percival has some serious gas out of the pen. Record 97–65.

2. Texas Rangers: this team has "Wild Card" written all over it. They lost Clark but have Palmiero back at first base, Juan Gonzalez has won two of the last three AL MVP awards, and Pudge Rodriguez is the best catcher in baseball. Record 86–76.

3. Oakland A's: this team will rival the Rangers for that Wild Card spot. Jason Giambi is a future star on a club which plays like a Rick Pitino coached team. Things are wide-open in the west. Record 82–80.

4. Seattle Mariners: They couldn't make the playoffs with Randy Johnson, and they're not going to come even close without him. Their bullpen sucks. Their starting pitching sucks. Their ownership sucks. On the bright side, they will get to play in an open-air dome. Ken Griffey Jr. is on pace to break Hank Aaron's home run mark, and his presence alone is enough to draw fans. It's just sad that a team that can score nine runs per game can't win consistently. Record 69–93.

Playoffs:

The Yankees will top the Rangers in the opening round for the third time in four years. Cleveland should creep past Anaheim before getting trounced by New York in the next round. The Bombers will dedicate this one to DiMaggio, and a fully-recovered Torre will go down as a Yankee hero. Three World Series titles in four seasons. That's some manager.

National League predictions will appear next week.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — It makes no sense for you to be singing the blues about something that you can easily control if you set your mind to it. Don't be a "victim."

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You can combine intellect and passion today and come up with results that surprise even those who are supporting you.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You can do things in a manner that lures a great deal of positive attention today, or you can remain in the background. You know your place.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You can familiarize yourself with the strange and unusual with surprising ease today, provided you keep an open mind.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be feeling a bit under the weather today, but you'll have to put it behind you if you wish to stay on schedule at this time.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may find yourself in a more dangerous position today than expected, but you are better equipped than anyone else. Have confidence, you can deal with it!

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You must be willing to do things for others today, just as you expect them to do for you. It's only through an equal trade that it will pay off for you at all.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You'll get the green light today, and you'll want to start as soon as possible. A new plan of action will result in you receiving much attention.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Be more conscious of personal security today. It's not so much that danger is imminent, but you can bring it on yourself if you're not careful.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Don't be tentative today. After all that you've done during the past week, can you afford to risk it all now by being indecisive or noncommittal?

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Someone close to you is likely to ask you the "key question" quite unexpectedly today. Your initial response will tell the tale.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Sure, you've been talking about taking a vacation with a good friend for some time, but when is it going to happen? Make firm plans today!

The passing of Joe D; AL teams still chasing NY

So Joe DiMaggio died, and most people are responding with a "whoop-dee-friggen-do." No one really cares except Peter Gammons and all the other folks old enough to be baseball fans in 1950. My mother wasn't even alive back then.

He was the great "Yankee Clipper." I'm sure he was. He had a 56-game hitting streak. Amazing, but he did it 38 years before I was born. Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel may be in tears, but his death just doesn't have the same effect on me. Then again, he was married to Marilyn Monroe. There's something to be said for that. But he did have to share her with the Kennedy brothers... remember the old song "Happy Birthday, Mista President?" Oh yes, I bet it was a happy birthday.

You know darn well that George "I sold my soul" Steinbrenner won't hesitate to turn a buck from his passing. Picture this: "The first 3,000 fans at the Stadium on Joe DiMaggio Day will receive a free Nobody Beats the Wiz replica of his jock strap," or something like that.

• In all fairness, it's been a rough spring for the Bronx Bombers. Skipper Joe Torre has been diagnosed with prostate cancer and bench-coach Don Zimmer will take the helm in the interim. But these minor setbacks are just that — minor. There is no way the Yankees can lose the World Series. None. Not with Roger Clemens.

Usually Atlanta boasts the top starting pitching staff in baseball, but they can't come close to New York. Take your pick: Atlanta has Greg Maddux, Tom Glavine, John Smoltz, Kevin Millwood, and Bruce Chen. The Bombers have Clemens, David Cone, Andy Pettitte, Hideki Irabu, and Orlando Hernandez. And then look at the closers. The Braves have Kerry Lightenberg. The Yankees have one of the game's top four closers in Mariano Rivera.

October is going to suck... and so isn't the American League East race for first place.

AL East Predictions:

1. New York Yankees: enough said. The only question is whether or not their 114 AL win record will be broken. Record 116–46.

2. Baltimore Orioles: Rafael Palmeiro; gone. Roberto Alomar; gone. But there's good news. Albert Belle is good for at least 40 home runs and 110 RBI. Will Clark is solid at first. Mike Mussina and Scott Erickson are dependable starters, but the bullpen may be a bit shaky. This team will still make a legitimate run at the Wild Card. Record 85–77.

3. Boston Red Sox: GM Dan Duquette was walking down Yawkey Way in his bullet-proof vest and came across a shiny penny. When he spotted the copper coin he picked it up and pinched it. Even the kids from linear math class know that that one Jose Offerman does not even equal 10 Mo Vaughns. Nomar is fine. The elbow talk is all bull. It's just tendonitis. Let's just hope the Martinez Bros. can win 40 games together. Tim Wakefield and Bret Saberhagen may give skipper Jimy Williams about 30 wins at best, but there are no lefties in the rotation. Record 78–84.

4. Toronto Blue Jays: this team is forever destined to be no better than a fourth-place club with all of the budget cutting they do. The salaries of Jose Canseco, Clemens, Randy Myers and Juan Guzman are gone... and so are their playoff chances. Record 69–93.

5. Tampa Bay Devil Rays: Canseco brings a hot bat to the Tropicana Dome. The only excitement that place will ever have, though, is this weekend's Final Four. Record 49–113.

AL Central:

1. Cleveland Indians: the Alomar Brothers (Roberto and Sandy) are at the heart of baseball's best batting order. The defense is phenomenal, too. Jaret Wright and Bartolo Colon are two of the best young pitchers in the game. This team is one year and one great pitcher away from greatness. They'll have to wait their turn until the Yankees are done with their run. Record 98–64.

2. Detroit Tigers: they don't have much other than Tony Clark, but this is the weakest division in baseball. Its second-place team won't be any better than 10 games under .500. Record 76–86.

3. Minnesota Twins: what the hell ever happened to Kirby Puckett, Kent Hrbek, Jack Morris, Gary Gaetti and Frank Viola? Tom Kelly is the best and longest-standing manager in the game. Brad Radke is an All-Star and Rick Aguilera is back in the bull-pen. Things are looking up in the Land of 10,000 Lakes. Record 70–92.

4. Kansas City Royals: Jeff King is God in K.C. That's not because he's great. It's because his team stinks.

UMass thumps Catamounts, 16–2

Anderson nets four goals in third win of year

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team used a trio of first-career-goals by Eileen Currier, Olivia Cabrera and Christy Ambrose, a four goal performance by Melissa Anderson and a 15-save effort by Jen Nardi in goal to defeat the Vermont Catamounts. The 16–2 win at Richard F. Garber Field yesterday afternoon improves the teams record to 3–1 on the season.

The Minutewomen dominated the Catamounts, outshooting them 25–20, and burying a high percentage of their shots. Most importantly, though, UMass was able to get a lot of players involved in the win.

"Very nice game. We knew that it would be a very good game for us to use our bench. Getting (Stephanie) Pavlick into the process was very critical," Massachusetts women's lacrosse Coach Francesca McClellan said. "Our bench has definitely evolved and the kids on the bench are getting stronger and stronger."

The Minutewomen used a total team effort to earn their third win of the young season. Anderson scored four goals, earning her second hat-trick of her career, but the most impressive part of her four goals was that it came on just four shots. Sophomore Fay Naber scored two goals along with an assist, while junior Noelle Gorski scored two goals.

Pavlick had a goal and two helpers for the Minutewomen, while Rachel Ingraffea and Sara MacNabb each tallied a goal and an assist.

"It was a really nice team game and I think that that shows up in the scoring distribution," McClellan said. "We are pretty consistent when it comes to scoring, half to half and game to game."

Despite the dismantling of Vermont, McClellan felt that this still was not her team's best possible performance. Especially in the first half, McClellan felt the team needed to pick it up.

"I don't think we played our best game. I told them at halftime that they were playing sloppy and that they were trying to get away with things, and that they will not be able to get away with that against the better teams," she said. "I think they came out in the second half doing that a little bit better."

The Minutewomen also received a solid effort in goal from both of their net-minders. Sophomore Tara Durkin started the game and made the only two saves that she had to make.

Then, with the score 6–0 in favor of UMass, McClellan felt it was time to play the sophomore keeper Jen Nardi, who collected 15 saves on 17 shots in 45 minutes of play.

"Got to play Nardi, and [Durkin's] ankle is fine," McClellan said. "She did a great job. She's been working on her low saves, and she did a very nice job of making low saves today."

Said UMass defender Lynne Young, who also scored a goal: "Nardi is just an awesome goalie. A goal goes in and she just gets her head up, and she just says it's not going to happen again. She is a wall and she's a great leader in the cage. She molds our defense."

One of UMass' best offensive players didn't play in the contest against the Catamounts. Senior attacker Laura Korutz missed the game. McClellan felt that this would be the best time to give Korutz a break.

"We gave other players an opportunity to play. One of the

Lots of moves as NHL deadline comes and goes

Just a few weeks ago, when Colorado acquired Theo Fleury and Philadelphia dealt for Mark Recchi, opening the flood gates to the trade waters, no one could have imagined the record number of trades that would come pouring down after them.

The National Hockey League's trading deadline was this past Tuesday and a number of teams got involved in what turned out to be a record-setting day. Thirty trades were made Tuesday as 20 teams scrambled to improve their rosters for the final 12 games and the quickly approaching playoffs.

Who came out the most improved will be determined in the first two weeks of June when the Stanley Cup Finals are played. If one was to look into a crystal ball right now though, the words three-peat might be shining brightly.

When Colorado traded for Fleury and Philly traded for Recchi, many believed that they had become the front-runners to make the Stanley Cup Finals. On Tuesday, though, the defending Stanley Cup Champion Detroit Red Wings got their wheels spinning, making four trades and establishing themselves as the team to beat again in the quest for Lord Stanley's Cup.

Of the most notable acquisitions that the Red Wings made was the blockbuster with Chicago for veteran defenseman Chris Chelios. Detroit did give up a young defenseman, Anders Eriksson, and their 1999 and 2000 first round draft picks, but in doing so made it clear that they are serious about a three-peat. Chelios brings a Stanley Cup ring (with Montreal in '86) and valuable experience and leadership to a team that already has proven leaders in Steve Yzerman, Brendan Shanahan and Larry Murphy.

As if Chelios' leadership wasn't enough, the Wings struck again, acquiring forward Wendel Clark from the Lightning for backup goaltender Kevin Hodson and a '99 sixth round pick. Clark will bring much needed relief at left wing, where Shanahan has been logging lengthy shifts and injuries all season. Most of all, though, Clark will bring some true grit and a huge heart, qualities that are essential to success in the playoffs.

The champs continued wheeling and dealing, acquiring four more Stanley Cup rings in goaltender Bill Ranford and defenseman Ulf Samuelsson. Samuelsson came from the Rangers for a couple of picks and Ranford from the Lightning for a conditional draft choice.

• As for the other deals that could have an effect on the playoffs, Colorado tried to keep pace with their rival Red Wings, snagging veteran forward Dale Hunter from the Capitals. Imagine a line with Hunter and Claude Lemieux. Opposing teams will be driven crazy as these two annoying nags are notorious for their pesky style of play. Do you think the Avalanche might be looking forward to another grudge match with Detroit in the Western Conference finals?

Remember 1997, when Mike Vernon scored a TKO over Patrick Roy at mid-ice in a brawl filled match that established the bad blood between the two teams. The Red Wings went onto to beat the Avalanche in six games that year and win the Cup over the Flyers.

• Speaking of those Flyers, they made a few deals themselves in an effort to pull out of a recent slump. The Flyers, coming off a team-record twelve-game winless streak, jumped into the trade madness themselves, adding tough guy Craig Berube (from the Capitals) and defenseman Steve Duschene (from the Kings). If Duschene can regain his old form, he will be an offensive weapon for Philly in the playoffs.

• Buffalo added some much needed offensive punch, acquiring sniper Joe Juneau from Washington for a minor league defenseman and the infamous future considerations.

• One team that has not been in the spotlight all season but just happens to be the best offensive squad in the NHL, is the Toronto Maple Leafs, who added another offensive weapon on Tuesday. The Leafs, who found out they would be without high-scoring forward Igor Korolev, so they picked up Yanic Perrault from the Kings for young Jason Podollin. Watch out for the Leafs in the postseason as they have enough offensive firepower, defensive talent and Curtis Joseph in net to make a serious run at the title.

• On a final note, the Bruins remained content on just making the playoffs, not listening to my suggestions about Ray Bourque and remaining inactive as everyone around them improved. The more things change, the more they stay the same.

Younger players lead total team effort

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The ball was being juggled around amidst a dense crowd of opposing players in front of the Vermont women's lacrosse team's net with just over eight minutes gone in the second half of the contest. First-year Massachusetts player Olivia Cabrera managed to gain control of the elusive object and continued her streaking momentum. With what seemed like minimal effort, the sophomore flicked a quick, underhanded shovel past freshman Catamount net-minder Susan McNeil.

Cabrera, like two other Minutewomen, scored her first career point in the 16–2 clobbering of Vermont yesterday. Sophomore Eileen Currier and freshman Christy Ambrose each put the big number one on their lifetime offensive stat sheets as well, as the three were among the eleven UMass players to record goals on the afternoon.

The Minutewomen, now 3–1 on the season, were led by senior co-captain Melissa Anderson, who was directly responsible for putting four shots by the Vermont goaltending duo of McNeil and Patricia Wentworth. The latter, a junior from South Burlington, Vt., started the game, but was replaced roughly half-way through the opening frame after allowing six goals to the relentless attack of UMass. That attack included twelve unanswered goals over the first 31:19 of the game and a 5–0 barrage before the 24:32 mark in the first half.

"A lot of our kids are looking like they're having a lot more fun playing, and that shows," UMass Coach Francesca McClellan said. "It shows on the scoreboard, it shows in the team play, and shows in all of those things."

The overpowered Catamounts simply could not keep up with any of the hosting UMass players, as the Massachusetts effort boasted points from midfielder Sara MacNabb and defender Lynne Young, who, although both dominant players, rarely grace the scoreboard with their performance. Both juniors, the two had five and six points, respectively, over the course of their two years wearing the maroon and white.

As the eventual result of the game became clear, several other Minutewomen tried their hand at testing the Vermont cage-minders as well. Sophomores Shalee Merkle and Kara DePaula, both listed as defenders, saw significant time in the Catamount zone.

"Everyone got in and got to show what they could do and prove themselves," Anderson said. "We got to run all of our plays. We saw different people on the defensive ends this time. We crossed-over defenders who had never been over on the attack side. Eileen scored a goal, Lynne scored a goal — those are defenders coming through."

When the defenders on the squad weren't busy giving the Vermont net hard time, they were denying nearly all the Catamount attempts to infiltrate the UMass perimeter. Holding the visitors to only two points — the first one coming with 18:41 left in the final half — the Minutewomen had just as much defensive participation as they had on the offensive end.

Highlighting the performance was goalie Jen Nardi, who entered the game for starter Tara Durkin at the 15:32 mark in the first half and proceeded to record 15 saves.

"She's a wall," Young said. "She's a great leader in the cage. She kind of molds our defense."

The team will need both sides of its game to show up this weekend when they travel to Syracuse, NY for a battle with the Orangewomen.

Minutemen rally and defeat Crusaders 8–7

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

A 13–6 loss at the hands of Providence College on Tuesday afternoon at Earl Lorden Field proved to be only a mere bump in the road for the Massachusetts baseball team.

The Minutemen took to the field yesterday afternoon in Worcester against Holy Cross with the hopes of putting the previous day's struggles behind them. And, with the help of a five-run fourth inning, the Maroon and White did exactly that in an 8–7 victory over the Crusaders.

Yesterday's game was shortened to seven innings because of rain. Nevertheless, UMass improved to 6–7 with the victory, while Holy Cross fell to 3–7 on the season.

The visitors jumped out to a quick 3–0 lead after three innings against Holy Cross starter Joe Manfredi. The Minutemen got single runs in the first, second, and third innings, topped off by Brian Samela's second home run in as many days in the third inning.

The Crusaders, though, stormed back in the home half of the fourth inning against UMass junior hurler Todd Samolewicz. Before the frame was complete, the transfer from North Adams State had been touched up for five runs, and Holy Cross captured a 5–3 advantage.

Overall, the lackluster fourth inning would prove to be the only blemish on Samolewicz's slate. The right-hander went five and a third innings, allowing five runs on seven hits. He also fanned six and walked that same number.

The most important number on the line for Samolewicz and the Minutemen, however, was the fact that the emerging hurler earned his second win of the season.

UMass bounced back to trim the HC lead to only a run thanks to a tally in the top of the fifth inning before breaking the game open with four scores in the sixth. Samela drove home Bryan Mazzaferro with an RBI ground-out.

Students meet Scott, trustees and faculty in closed discussion

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

There were mixed reviews about the productivity of a meeting yesterday afternoon between trustees, the chancellor, Student Government Association leaders, faculty and students over the recent change in admissions policies.

As the participants exited the closed meeting of about 30 individuals, their account of what happened inside for nearly four hours ranged from positive to positively outraged.

"I think we got to know each other better [and showed] we're not the big, bad trustees," said Bob Karam, chairman of the Board of Trustees. "We didn't do it [change the policy] without thinking... there is a law and there are court opinions on that law."

But some students had a different reaction to the meeting.

"We didn't get shit. That's the bottom line. All we got was a potential dialogue, meetings set up... they will not [enact] a moratorium [on the current admissions policy]," said Kiya Stokes, a graduate student and member of the steering committee of the Task Force for Equal Opportunity and Access for All People, as he left the meeting. "So we got to continue the pressure. Period."

John Bracey, an Afro-American studies professor who attended the meeting said he feels Karam was honest.

"I trust him," Bracey said. "I think at his level he's sincere in what he's saying."

Karam stressed he did not come to the meeting in reaction to Wednesday's protests. He said the meeting had been planned months ago.

There will be another meeting between the trustees and student leaders April 9.

But besides setting the April date, Chancellor David K. Scott said better communication was the net result of the meeting.

"It established a very good dialogue and we want to continue that dialogue," Scott said.

One student agreed with Scott's summation but said the meeting did not produce tangible results for students.

"They said they were going to have meetings to discuss it and an ongoing dialogue. Students kept trying to push for something concrete... they basically didn't offer them [students] anything," said Sarah Demas, a sophomore social thought and political economy major, who said she decided to attend the meeting after hearing about it during Wednesday's rally.

Interim Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs, Javier Cevallos, said the atmosphere of the meeting was a change from Wednesday's rally and sit-in where he was questioned by the protesting students.

"It was a very informative meeting. There were a lot of passionate students [who] brought up very similar issues but in a very different way... It was very civil," Cevallos said.

With administrators standing firm against calling a moratorium on the admissions policy as students have requested, and Stokes promising to "continue the pressure," more student protests are expected.

Scott said students "can march and express their anxiety," but hopes they aren't disruptive to university business.

The meeting, which was planned to be open to the press, was closed after some individuals in the meeting were concerned media attention would not allow a free dialogue.

Karam said he asked the several reporters assembled "Do you have a problem with this?" and they replied that they didn't mind the meeting being closed.

"It's better to be able to talk frankly," Scott said, than have the individuals in the meeting worried about being quoted.

Shooting victim tells story of his drug deal gone wrong

BETH ARKLEVSKAYA

Sokha Chhim, (seated at left) the Amherst high school student accused of shooting former UMass student Russell Bishop, stands trial in Hampshire County District Court today.

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Shooting victim Russell Bishop gave up his Fifth Amendment right to self-incrimination yesterday as he related the details of the $1,100 drug transaction that nearly cost him his life.

Russell, a former University of Massachusetts student, was shot in the neck point-blank during a botched drug transaction in his Cashin dorm room on Oct. 30. Despite the near-fatal wound, Bishop remained conscious and was able to recount almost every detail of what happened in Northampton Supreme Court yesterday at the trial of 18-year-old Amherst resident Sokha Chhim.

Chhim is being charged with assault with intent to murder, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, assault with a dangerous weapon, and unlawful possession of a firearm.

Bishop said Chhim bought one eighth of an ounce of marijuana earlier that day for a reduced price of $30 as a "business gesture," after Chhim expressed an interest in purchasing an additional four ounces for $1,100.

"He said he would be back later with the money," Bishop testified. "I told him I didn't want him to come with anyone else... because selling marijuana in a dorm room is shady business... I like to keep small numbers of people around."

But Chhim did not heed Bishop's request, and returned later that day with another Amherst high school student, Dana Roy, Bishop said.

Bishop was sitting at his desk eating a dinner of steak and portabella mushrooms prepared by his friend, Joshua Massin, who sat behind him on the floor when Chhim arrived and the drug transaction started.

Bishop said he did not remember whether or not he took the four ounces of bagged marijuana out of the refridgerator at that point. He did remember requesting money from Chhim, who began to complain about the price.

"I remember looking down [at the triple-beam measuring scale on his desk] annoyed," Bishop said. "Most people are happy with my prices. This guy constantly complained."

The next thing Bishop remembered was the sight of a shiny silver-handled gun with a rounded barrell being pointed at his head and the words, "Freeze, motherfucker!"

He stood up and pushed the gun away from his face with his arm. But he admitted that since he was "stoned," he was sluggish. The gun was placed against the skin of his neck, Bishop heard a "large bang" and "felt the sting of the bullet" go through his neck.

He fell directly on his back and lay on the floor, blood gushing from the wound, and watched as the gun was then pointed at Massin, who scrambled onto the bed and, according to Assistant District Attorney David Ross, "pled for his life curled up in a fetal position."

Bishop then saw the back of someone who went to the refridgerator to grab the marijuana. Both Chhim and Roy then fled the room, Bishop said. Roy is not being charged with any crime. He came forward to the police and is scheduled to testify as a state witness sometime next week.

After they fled the room, Massin grabbed a green towel and held it to Bishop's throat. Bishop said he was surprised he was still breathing at that point, and observed a few people standing in the room.

While Massin was on the phone calling 911, Bishop ordered someone to remove the scale and other drug paraphanalia because he knew the police would arrive, but everyone was "white as ghosts" and did not remove anything, he said.

Bishop was taken by ambulance to Bay State Medical Center in Springfield and went into surgery to "clear out the throat area and sew his esophogus back together." He told of his time in the hospital, where he was put into an induced coma so his ruptured vertabrae could heal.

He then stepped down from the stand, took off his tie, and approached the jury to display the bullet entry and exit scars on his neck and right shoulder. He has almost completely healed from the injury, but has not regained total mobility in his right arm, and his thumb is still numb.

Bishop was originally uncooperative with police. "I was a pot seller," he said, "these were police. We work on different sides of the fence. I was scared. I was on lots of medication. I wanted to wait until my head was on straight."

But while he was lying in bed, he did a lot of thinking, Bishop said. And when asked yesterday if he was sure he was willing to incriminate himself to testify, he told Judge Judd Carhart, "I wish to say what needs to be said."

Bishop's testimony will continue today at 9 a.m. The trial is expected to continue until the middle of next week.

GOP budget is approved for fiscal yr. 2000

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sharply split along party lines, the House yesterday ratified a Republican "budget for the new millennium," a blueprint designed to showcase support for Social Security, the Pentagon and a new round of tax cuts.

Democrats argued that the GOP-backed tax reductions would favor the wealthy at the expense of the long-term health of Medicare and Social Security.

The vote on passage was 221-208, and came after a full day of debate that centered on priorities for the budget surpluses that are forecast for the next several years. All but two Republicans voted for the plan. Only four Democrats supported it.

Across the Capitol, Senate Republicans were driving toward passing a similar budget for the 2000 fiscal year, which begins Oct. 1.

The vote in the House marked a triumph for the new speaker, Rep. Dennis Hastert, who had made its passage the top priority of his early months as leader of the slender Republican majority.

Hastert, R-Ill., said the GOP prescription "saves more for Social Security and Medicare than the president's budget." In addition, it "provides for common-sense tax relief in the future. We have the largest surplus in history, which means the taxpayers are being overcharged," he said in a statement.

At the White House, President Clinton issued a statement describing the measure as a "series of missed opportunities." The tax and spending plan did not "do enough to pay down the debt and strengthen Social Security and Medicare," he added.

The budget, which sets guidelines for tax and spending bills later in the year, would be the first to be written by Congress since the government entered a new era of surpluses. And while House and Senate plans differed in detail, they had common priorities and served as the focus for a fierce partisan debate over Social Security, Medicare and tax cuts.

Rep. John Kasich, R-Ohio, chairman of the House Budget Committee, said the plan could "not only preserve Social Security and Medicare," but emphasize defense and education. "We also believe the American people ought to be empowered, the American people ought to have more money in their pockets," he said, referring to almost $800 billion envisioned for tax cuts over the next decade.

"I think we project a budget for the new millennium that is right in pace" with what the public wants,

Students express concern about pedestrian safety

By Stacey Shackford and Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The death of two students as a result of motor vehicle pedestrian accidents this academic year has raised concerns about pedestrian safety at the University of Massachusetts.

Honors student Allison Lustig, 22, died three weeks ago, on March 11, from injuries sustained when a vehicle struck her as she was crossing in a crosswalk on Commonwealth Avenue. Kerry Hines, 25, met a similar fate five months earlier as she was crossing in front of Hills House.

Hines' death triggered alarm and reaction among students, staff and administration at the University. Shortly after the accident, members of the Vice Chancellor's Summit on Safety committee met to discuss ways to increase pedestrian safety on campus.

Greg Ng, a student representative to the Summit on Safety, says the committee is committed to protecting the safety of the University community, and has been especially concerned about pedestrians.

It has also been very receptive to the suggestions of students, he said. This semester, a student suggestion to add speed bumps and mirrors to the Student Union access road was brought to the committee and immediately implemented.

Members of the committee have also considered a suggestion to add speed bumps and a sidewalk along Stockbridge Road, near the Faculty Club and Wilder Hall. However, concerns about logistics, and the ability of emergency vehicles and snowplows to access the area, prevented the suggestion from being implemented.

UMass Police Chief John Luippold, who sits on the committee, said recently that the UMass Police are very concerned about pedestrian safety and police officers will continue to enforce pedestrian right of way at crosswalks.

But many students questioned yesterday said they feel the University is not doing enough to enforce pedestrian safety.

"I don't really see anyone enforcing crosswalks," said junior nursing student Katie Kellner. "People just sort of speed through campus; they don't really stop for anyone."

Memorial service for Figueroa scheduled

A memorial service for deceased University of Massachusetts student Jose Figueroa will be held Wednesday, April 7 at 6 p.m. in the Cape Cod lounge of the Student Union.

Figueroa was reported missing Jan. 26 after leaving a party in Turner's Falls earlier that evening. Figueroa's body was discovered by a police search on March 19 in a Turner's Falls power canal.

Figueroa, who was from Everett, was a senior finance and operations major who lived in Brett Residence Hall.

Funeral services were private and burial is at the convenience of the family.

Messages of condolence may be sent to Jose and Maria Figueroa, 20 Tileston Street, Everett, MA, 02149.

Memorial service for Lustig rescheduled

The memorial service for deceased University of Massachusetts student Allison Lustig has been changed from 6 p.m. to 3 p.m. on Wednesday, March 31 at the Newman Center.

Lustig died March 11 from injuries suffered when she was struck by a car while crossing Commonwealth Avenue near the intersection of Governors Drive on March 3.

A memorial wreath has been erected at the site of the accident.

PBS aired Simmons: admissions discussed

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

In the midst of the affirmative action battle on the campus of the University of Massachusetts, a national argument on the topic is also being waged — an argument that has resurrected a discussion of race in America.

Tuesday evening the Public Broadcast Station (PBS) aired "Beyond Black and White: Affirmative Action in America," a special presentation of the Fred Friendly Seminar series. The program, hosted by Harvard Law Professor Charles Ogletree, featured a panel of politicians, educators and activists who represent the entire spectrum of opinion regarding affirmative action.

The panel played various roles in a hypothetical situation concerning a black female college freshman. The freshman, called "Angela," is offered admission to "Big State," whereas her white counterpart with identical qualifications, is denied admission.

Affirmative action proponent and president of Smith College, Ruth Simmons, played the role of Angela's mother while Ward Connerly, representative of the American Civil Rights Institute and opponent to Affirmative Action, played her father.

Ogletree asked Connerly if he was happy about his daughter's acceptance to Big State.

"I've always told you," he addressed Angela (played by a Princeton University alumna), "not to check those silly little boxes on applications. There's going to be resentment towards you. They'll tag you.

"Angela is a high performance student. She's going to be a 'minority student'; Angela wasn't raised that way," he said.

Simmons argued that although her daughter was chosen with a "plus factor," other plus factors, like athletics and family alumni, lead to the acceptance of students.

Later on in the presentation Simmons added that she finds the way merit is talked about in regards to affirmative action troubling. Other factors in admissions, said Simmons, remain untalked about.

"The motives, when we are trying to make these decisions, can be suspect," she said.

Connerly continued his argument that the essence of affirmative action is inequality.

"Remember when we heard Kennedy speak?" he asked Simmons. "In 1964 when Civil Rights was enacted and we all were treated equal— weren't we ecstatic?"

Simmons accused Connerly of wearing rose-colored glasses.

"She [Angela] still cannot go into a department store without being followed by security," she said.

Connerly interjected, "I think we'd be better off getting rid of the baggage of race."

Ogletree asked the panelists about the affect elimination of race-based admissions might have on culturally-based curriculum, like African-American studies.

"I think African-American studies is very limiting. I'd sway Angela away from that. I don't think it would help her future," Connerly said.

But dissolving affirmative action, he added, would probably not have any effect on curriculum.

major Katie Lordan, offered suggestions.

"Maybe they could have more signs saying, 'You have to stop at crosswalks. It's a law. There's a fine.'"

"I hope they put more stoplights on this street," said sophomore Karen Schulwitz as she walked along North Pleasant Street.

"Nobody ever stops for you. You have to wait until the road is empty. I shouldn't be afraid to cross the street at my own school."

Others feel the University is not solely responsible for the safety of pedestrians.

"I don't know if it's up to the University as much as it is to people who drive cars to be more careful," said Sarah Carpenter, a senior studying biochemistry.

"It will not even help if you have 10,000 more policemen," Asif Baysal, a research associate in the physics department, said.

"People pass without looking. The critical issue is to make people look, and take care of themselves in the first place. The second is for the drivers not to exceed the speed limits."

Geoff Weber, a local resident, added: "I don't go to this school, but it looks really dangerous to me. Look at all of these people crossing in the middle of the street. I'm not surprised people are getting hit. The drivers are at fault, too. Everybody speeds around here."

■ budget

he said.

Democrats countered with a letter from the chief actuarial expert at the Social Security agency, who wrote that the House GOP plan would do nothing to extend the life of the system.

"They choose the tax cuts over extending the solvency of Social Security and Medicare," charged Democratic leader Dick Gephardt of Missouri. He said a Democratic plan of smaller, targeted tax cuts, would be fairer.

In a bewildering mountain of budget statistics, each side found fine print to buttress their claim to being the stronger defender of Social Security and Medicare.

Republicans, for example, said they would put aside the entire Social Security surplus for debt reduction. They also won a letter of praise for their approach to Social Security and Medicare from the American Association for Retired Persons, the nation's largest advocacy group for senior citizens.

Democrats countered that over 15 years, their plan would set aside more money for Social Security and Medicare than the GOP prescription.

None of the plans presented for debate provided any specific changes in Medicare or Social Security. Instead, they earmarked hundreds of billions of newly available surplus funds for debt reduction, a step designed to strengthen the economy and make it easier for the government to pay benefits.

Overall, the House plan called for $1.74 trillion in spending for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 and forecast a surplus of $141 billion. The Senate proposal would spend $1.74 trillion and produce a $135 billion surplus.

Republicans would cut taxes next year by up to $15 billion and by $778 billion over the next decade. While the budget outlined no specifics, key Republicans have talked in terms of reducing the so-called marriage penalty or reducing tax rates as possibilities. By contrast, President Clinton's budget, submitted to Congress earlier in the year, called for spending of $1.79 trillion and would leave an $80 billion surplus. Clinton called for tax cuts totaling $81 billion through 2009 — but he recommended increasing tobacco and other taxes by $178 billion.

In other areas, Clinton would spend $281 billion next year for defense, compared with $289 billion by Republicans.

Senate Republicans matched Clinton's proposal for education and job training, exceeding the House total by $2 billion.

Clinton's budget had scant support in either house of Congress, so much so that the House buried it, 426-2, with one lawmaker voting present. The Senate rejected it Wednesday night.

In preliminary votes on the House floor, two separate Democratic alternatives were rejected.

One called for smaller tax cuts than the GOP plan and more money for selected domestic programs. Supporters said it also would extend the life of Social Security until 2050 and of Medicare until 2020. It failed on a vote of 250-173.

The second, crafted by a group of moderate to conservative Democrats, set aside more money than any other alternative for debt reduction and had the smallest tax cuts. It was rejected, 295-134. A similar debate unfolded in the Senate.

Grade Point Absurdity

I suppose that somewhere, perhaps in some shady desk drawer, perhaps on some isolated computer database, there lies a document the contents of which vaguely resemble the following: Bill Larkin, 2.6.

Now for those of you who think that the number directly to the right of my name represents my Blood Alcohol Content over spring break, allow me to illustrate the error of your ways. That number associated with my name is my Grade Point Average (GPA) here at the University.

Bill Larkin

My father recently asked me what happened to my studies, why my grades had fallen so sharply. "Bill, what happened?" he asked. He went as far as to question my intelligence, no small insult indeed.

Let me assure you that my quantitatively-challenged GPA is not due to my involvement with the Cannabis Reform Coalition, nor has it anything to do with narcolepsy, as some have claimed. I am a smart individual. Carefree I may be, a bit lazy at times, but idiot savant I am not.

> "All this unfair exodus of student funds, materials and teachers really has my panties in a bunch."

Instead, my academic meandering is in fact due to the reckless events of one chaotic week. Last semester at exam time, some wicked fury decided to instill in me an allergy to schoolwork and a fetish for the classics. Not that I would expect anyone here at the University to be ignorant of exactly what I mean by the "classics", but I specifically refer here to the works of Dante Alighieri and John Milton.

I could not get enough of the Divine Comedy; I could not put Paradise Lost down. My schoolbooks seemed foreign to me; I grew nauseated at the mere sight of a college text. In fact, I attempted to get a prescription for medicinal marijuana to ease my malignancy, but somehow that just didn't work out. Something about chronic drug abuse, I think. Needless to say, I did not study for any of my exams, and it doesn't take a math major to figure out what my reckless abandonment did to my GPA.

I tell you all this to illustrate what I feel is an atrocity here at UMass. The Honors Program at the school only accepts those with an acceptable GPA. Not a big deal, I suppose, until recently. Previously, students enrolled here could choose from all the class syllabi, including the honors courses. However, with the introduction of the Commonwealth College, a new honors college to be located on university grounds, some students will be shut out of opportunities. Those students are you and I, the academically inadequate. Academically inadequate, my left testicle. I'm just as intelligent as the next man, and that's when I'm not stoned.

Where are the finances for all this reconstruction coming from? I haven't noticed any faculty out pimping on North Pleasant Street, but I did catch my geography professor selling stolen stereo equipment the other day across the street from Antonio's. Damn social studies majors. Maybe that's how the school plans to pay for this. Seriously, I don't see how else the University intends to foot this bill, unless we, the academically inadequate, are forced to pay for it.

Governor Paul Cellucci wants to use a portion of the state's surplus to finance this project, and that's fine. However, the proposed sum of $15 million should only cover construction costs for the new buildings to be located in Orchard Hill. Who is going to teach these new Commonwealth classes? I don't think cloning technology has advanced to the point where we can duplicate UMass faculty. I really don't want anymore graduate students teaching my classes. Sorry, grads, but I would rather learn from a qualified, experienced professor. We could always use sheep though, they seem to be popular across campus. I hear they work wonders with calculus.

The school has much more glaring needs to fill than the construction of a Commonwealth College. I think most of the elitist youth associated with the Honors Program are quite content with their situation anyhow. UMass needs more professors. I am sick of immature and inexperienced graduate students. UMass needs updated computer science and engineering facilities. Have you seen Duda, anyone? UMass needs to put more money into some of the sports programs. Am I the only one upset that the school does not have a golf team?

All this unfair exodus of student funds, materials and teachers really has my panties in a bunch. I have no problem whatsoever with the University attempting to produce Rhodes Scholars. Good for them. Bartender, a round on the house. On me.

After all, why are we here? "Higher Learning." The stuff of the ivory tower. The library of Alexandria. I'm all for it. However, the inequitable distribution of these higher learning opportunities incenses me to no end. Do I not pay the same tuition as Joe B. Learnin? Am I not worthy of the same opportunities? You tell me. Until then, I'll be doing some homework. Or not.

My grandparents recently lost a very good friend. His name was Barney and he had been living with them for the past 17 years. I can only describe Barney as wise and as someone who you wanted to have around. I met him when I was just a young lad of two, and at that time he was pretty frightening.

Brian Lohnes

He was loud and was not at all willing to have new and unfamiliar faces in the house. It was during those 17 years that all of us in the family bonded and grew with him; it will be very strange to be at my grandparents' house without him around.

Barney had fallen ill some time ago and the doctors had given him a very short period in which to live. He fought a valiant struggle and out lived even the most optimistic doctor's expectations. It was just about two weeks ago that Barney collapsed on the floor in the living room. In all act that could only be described as heroic, my grandmother and father put him in the car and rushed to the doctor.

> "When they arrived, they were confronted with two options: one was to try 'heroic action' and save him by any means possible and the other was to let nature take its course."

When they arrived, they were confronted with two options: one was to try "heroic action" and save him by any means possible and the other was to let nature take its course. After some thinking, they agreed that he would want nature to be the deciding factor. This was a difficult decision to make and the outcome was unfortunately grim.

Back when I was just two, I met Barney for the first time. He scared the hell out of me because he was loud and really, really defensive when meeting new people. As the years went on, we spent Thanksgivings, Christmases and many other family holidays with him. It was during these times that we got to know him for who he was. Barney was intelligent and fun to be around after he got to know you. In him, my grandparents found great company.

Often, he and my grandfather would fall asleep watching TV together in the living room. Barney would go walking with my grandmother and he would follow her around when she was doing her gardening and hanging up the laundry. As he got to know us we became pretty close. He would greet us at the door when the family would go over, and he would always be there with a smile that was beaming with energy. Years back he would play with us kids like he really was one, and he was always looking for attention from us.

Occasionally, he and my grandfather would get into a tiff, but those lasted a few minutes at best and then all was well. He and my grandmother seemed to have an unspoken communication between them; she knew when he was hungry and what he wanted to eat and he knew when to make himself scarce when my grandmother was knitting.

Understandably, my grandparents are shaken and saddened by the death of a close friend, but they are preparing to move on. Seventeen years is a long time and it will take a while before all the wounds are healed.

By the way, Barney was a dog. Friends and companions come in all shapes and sizes. Every bond in our lives should be held close to the heart. I hope you didn't realize that he was a dog because it was to prove a point. No matter who or what you love in your life, make sure that you don't take he, she or it for granted because when they are gone, you feel guilty that you didn't pay more attention to them when they were here.

So I figure I'll write some notes on what I've learned so far this semester without completing one homework assignment yet this year. I've decided I won't discuss grim job prospects, lack of a tan or the fact that I have no life because I live in a certain basement, so we'll see how it goes...

Ellen Speaks at UMass

The Stonewall Center will be presenting a talk by Ellen DeGeneres called "Acceptance Through Laughter," a benefit for the Stonewall Scholarship Fund. The Stonewall Fund is an emergency fund to assist GLBT students who are cut off financially from their parents after disclosing their sexual orientation.

Ellen DeGeneres made television history in 1997 when her character on the television show Ellen came out as a lesbian. There has been a lot of controversy about the show, which gained record ratings and was cancelled. DeGeneres earned an Emmy award for the show's writing, was featured on the cover of TIME magazine, and received many Emmy, SAG and Golden Globe Nominations.

DeGeneres' career began as an emcee at a comedy club in her hometown of New Orleans. She can also be seen starring opposite Matthew McConaughey, Woody Harrelson and Jenna Elfman in the movie EdTv which will be released this month.

The talk will be presented April 6 at 7:30 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. Tickets are available by calling the FAC box office at 545-2511 or (800) 999-8627 at a cost of $10 with a UMass student ID, or $20 for the general public. Gold Circle tickets are available for $100, which include seating in the front rows and admittance to a VIP reception with DeGeneres following the talk.

Equality Begins at Home stages Northampton vigil

By Jake Ulien
Collegian Staff

The audience burst into applause when the speaker began by remarking, "I wish I wasn't here tonight."

The comment was no joke. The speaker, Felice Yeskel, was one of more than 50 people in attendance at the Western Massachusetts Equality Begins at Home Vigil, held on the steps of Northampton City Hall on Tuesday, March 23.

"I wish I didn't need to be here tonight," she continued.

Yeskel, the director of the University of Massachusetts Stonewall Center, was at the vigil to speak about the lack of legal equality for non-heterosexuals.

Stacey Roth, the chair of Equality Begins at Home for Western Massachusetts, the President of the LGBT Political Alliance of Western Massachusetts and a UMass alum, spoke about personal discrimination.

"I remember being 19 and 20 years old on the campus of UMass, and being branded a dyke and a few," she said. "I also remember well, after coming out, that it was the right thing to do, and that I was never going back.

"I was on campus at the time of the founding of the Stonewall Center," she added. "It's really nice to see the difference now."

Yeskel and Roth were two of many speakers at the vigil, which was held in honor of those who have lost their lives in the struggle for GLBT rights. It was one of many events being held this week in Massachusetts as part of Equality Begins at Home, a political campaign organized by the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force (NGLTF).

The NGLTF states that the goal of their campaign is to focus on state legislatures, where, they say, "the number of gay-related bills has steadily grown."

Some of the topics discussed at the vigil were domestic partnership benefits, same-sex marriage, and the "archaic" sodomy laws of Massachusetts, which punish perpetrators of oral or anal sex with a prison sentence of up to 20 years.

"This event, and others across the country like it, are very important, because many of the laws that put GLBT people in a position of legal inequality are passed at a state level," said attendee Lee Badgett, an assistant professor of economics at UMass.

"We're here to tell our local representatives to the state legislature that we want those laws changed," he added.

The Reverend Kent Higgins, the campus chaplain for UMass, also spoke at the vigil, in the name of "the allies of GLBT justice within the Christian and other religious communities."

"Dialogue and the search for social justice have been high on our list of priorities," said Higgins. "Not all Christians are for the dominance of Victorian family values."

"I want to lend our support to Equality Begins at Home," he stated emphatically.

One of the evening's most prominent guests was Northampton Mayor Mary Ford. Mayor Ford, who established the Northampton Human Rights Commission, oversaw the expansion of domestic partnership benefits to the same-sex partners of city employees in 1997.

"I think it's so important to have this particular week, where organizational efforts across the nation are directed at state houses across the nation," she said. "Let's keep up this fight and extend it across the nation!"

Currently, Massachusetts is one of only 10 states that criminalizes discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. It is also one of 20 states without an official ban on same-sex marriage, although, like all other states, it does not actually recognize same-sex marriages. An anti-marriage bill was recently entered into the state legislature.

"I have worked for the state for 17 years. I have been with my partner for 6 years. We still have to pay out of our pockets for my partner's health benefits," said Yeskel.

"The way the state law defines family is as a heterosexual nuclear family. I have been discriminated against simply because my partner is a woman," she said.

Most of those in attendance at the vigil gathered on the City Hall steps and peacefully held candles, although at one point a passing driver rolled down his window to scream "Shut up!" repeatedly. Another driver screamed, "Fuck you!" The audience simply ignored them and continued with the vigil.

"I brought a friend with me tonight," said writer and activist Warren Blumenfeld, as he placed a small Tinky Winky doll on the city hall steps, "for we are all in this together."

Out Professor's Panel to Speak

By Christine Savage
Collegian Correspondent

On Tuesday, March 30, a panel of out UMass gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered professors will speak about their experiences in academia. The event, sponsored by the Pride Alliance, was organized in response to student interest.

Panel organizer Katie Herzig said, "The panel is an opportunity for students to hear professors' experiences being out both in the classroom and within their own departments."

Started last year, the event also increases the visibility of GLBT faculty. Kate Geyer said regarding last years event, "I was encouraged to see openly queer faculty speak out when so many remain closeted. I think it's important that people realize it's possible to be out and to be a professor."

Last spring, the Out Professor's Panel featured five UMass professors and instructors, and was attended by nearly 100 people. This year four professors will speak at the event. Each professor will speak briefly, and the speeches will be followed by a question and answer period.

A range of topics, from perceived academic credibility to "schmoozing" were addressed at the Spring 1998 event. While some experiences seemed to be shared, the panelists generally had different stories and reactions to present. The opening speaker, Lisa Henderson, said she was the only professor at her previous institution, Penn State, that openly identified as gay or lesbian, and spoke about how it affected her relationships with students and faculty. Warren Blumenfeld discussed teaching EDUC 210, Social Diversity in Education and his involvement with GLBT college issues, including the National Queer Student Coalition. Helan Page discussed race and gender perception in his role as an educator.

Depending on his gender presentation, students perceive him as filling different stereotypical roles. "I was surprised to see some of the experiences were shared by the panel members. I had not considered the impact of being out as a professor," Kate Geyer commented.

The out professors panel will be held Tuesday, March 30, at 7 p.m. in Campus Center room 917. Everyone is welcome.

Out and Abroad

Siobhan Owen

It's Saturday night, 1 a.m., and I'm in the basement laundry room. I came here for some peace and quiet. I suppose it's inevitable, really, that I should feel a wee bit lonesome. It is Saturday night after all, and I'm on my own. But I'm nowhere near as miserable as I used to be on Saturday nights.

When I came out, I explained to a few friends that even if I was single for the rest of my life I would still be happier as a single lesbian than I ever was when I had a boyfriend. I spent the years when I was 16 through 22 desperately trying to convince myself, my friends and my family that I was a normal, straight girl. In my heart, I knew that I was living a lie. I also knew that I'd never have the guts to tell the truth about it as long as I stayed in Scotland.

People are always asking me why I came here, to Massachusetts. I usually mutter something about it being very liberal and diverse here. The truth is, I came here to come out.

A few weeks ago I went to see the film Waking Ned Divine. Although set in Ireland, the lifestyle portrayed has many similarities to what life is like in Scotland. The scenes of village life made me homesick in more ways than one. Of course, I miss the hills, the people and the community. The film made me realize, however, that I'll never have that kind of life.

I'll never have the life that I've been groomed for, the life that everyone wants for me. I'll never be able to introduce my girlfriend to my down-to-earth Glaswegian family. She won't be able to sit down and enjoy a drink and a blether with them like my sister's boyfriend does.

It's not just that I'll never have a husband. It's that I'll never have the village life; the pub, the ceilidhs, the family. The town that I came from has no gay community. If I want, I can take a bus and then a train to Edinburgh for a day. There are a few gay bars there. In Scotland, my options are either to move to the city or stay in the closet. I knew that if I wanted to gain the strength I needed to admit to myself and others that I was a lesbian I would have to move to a more supportive, liberal area. That's when I heard of UMass.

Since I've been here, I have discovered a lot of things about lesbians that I never knew before. They come in all shapes and sizes. Some cover themselves with rainbows and talk about it all the time, others never mention it. Some are promiscuous, others saintly. Girlfriends, I've discovered, can break your heart too. It might all seem obvious, but I'd only met two lesbians at my university before I came here. I think I had heard the word "lesbian" used in conversation in hushed, conspiratorial tones maybe a handful of times.

I'm a lot happier since I came out. There is so much freedom here. There are, however, labels and restrictions to be dealt with even here. Like the way that when I wear jeans and a t-shirt that shows off my tattoo, I'm a "dyke," but when I wear a skirt and lipstick, I'm a "femme." As if its all some sort of statement. In Scotland, I'm always just me, Siobhan.

My year at UMass has taught me a lot about being gay, about being out, and about having the confidence to accept myself. Part of me wants to stay here forever. I have no idea what the future holds for me when I go home to Scotland. That thought is both scary and exciting.

At one point in time, there were probably only three "out" lesbians at UMass. Now there are hundreds. Maybe I'll be the third out lesbian at my university in Scotland. Who knows? Wish me luck.

Siobhan Owen is an international exchange student from Scotland.

United We Stand

Elizabeth Fernandez

My identity as a lesbian is crucial to the person that I am. I have gained a crucial insight to who I am today by drawing on my own strengths in the trouble and experience I have had coming out to myself, the world, and trying to deal with the way homophobic society treats me. My identity goes further in that I recognize myself as a woman, and the encounters and issues I have faced in being so. I have done this by realizing the limitations society has put on me, and also identity as a person in the whole spectrum of the human experience.

My views are in no way exclusive only to a certain category that I fit into, whether it be that I am a woman, lesbian, left handed, middle class or part of any other smaller category that I may fit into. All experiences are inherently human issues, and all too often I think people dismiss a lot of important basic human issues and rights with expressions like "That's a Black Issue," "That's a woman's issue," "That has to do with welfare" or "That doesn't really affect me."

People have to realize that as a species, all issues are collectively all of ours. Our own culture and identity is very important to who we are; but on a wider scope, we should all have the understanding that we are in this human experience together. As we strive to make the world a better place through reform and action, we should keep in mind that we should be trying to make the world a better place for all races, genders, classes or any group oppressed by force. No form of perceived injustice, whether it be homophobia, classism or racism, should be cast aside by people who it does not affect as individuals.

By believing an issue is exclusive to one group in society we are forgetting about making the world and human experience better on the whole. Of course we are all going to be affected more personally by things that affect us individually, and I am in no way dismissing or condemning that fact. We are all struggling together to overcome injustices in our society, and by treating all issues as human issues rather than designated group issues, we will make a much more powerful impact on our society and future societies.

Classism in the Community

Mary Miles

Over break I read a book called Queerly Classed, which discussed the difference between GLBT people from varying economic backgrounds. I have been thinking about class as it relates to the GLBT community a lot lately, especially with all of the current affirmative action debates going on here at school. A teach-in for affirmative action taught me that there is a direct correlation between what students score on the SATs and what their parents income is. While economic wealth is often slanted depending on a person's ethnicity, a queer person can be born into any economic situation. The money that the person makes later in life is a different story.

Last year I attended Springfield College, and two lesbian speakers who ran a women's camp for lesbians in rural Mississippi came to speak to one of our classes. These two women wanted to open a safe space for rural lesbians to live and work together. Yet many hate crimes were deterring them— crimes such as having their car run off the road and not being sold lumber to build an addition to their home. The women also faced a lack of support from the police. Many students listening to this found it to be very disturbing, and asked why the women continued to keep their camp in Mississippi, when they could just move East where they would gain more support. The women said that people were constantly suggesting that they move, and by doing so, were missing their point entirely. The women based the camp in Mississippi because it was their home, and felt that the area had an urgent need for it.

I thought about this while comparing two recent speakers who have come to UMass: Barbara Smith and Tony Kushner. These speakers initially seemed to be coming from two totally different experiences. Smith grew up a black woman, Kushner a privileged white male. Smith was one of the only black women to graduate from her class at Wellesley in the sixties, Kushner one of many Caucasian males to graduate from Columbia. They both grew up to be gay, they both grew up to be writers.

Smith's speech focused on writing giving her the power to change things, her love for James Baldwin and his constant themes of racism, oppression and injustice, and the separatism between straight people and queer people in the African-American community. Barbara Smith reminded me of the women from Mississippi because she wrote black feminist criticism in 1972, a time when there was no demand for it. She said that it did not matter if anyone read it, because she wanted it to be available when someone wanted to read it. She ended her speech by saying that she hoped her new book, The Truth That Never Hurts, would receive good reviews, not only because it was her book, but because it would be a reflection of her entire community.

Kushner, however, has already won the Pulitzer Prize. His plays focus upon oppression of all kinds. Angels in America, A Bright Room Called Day and his other works are highly acclaimed. I was surprised and pleased to hear their very similar political views. Both Kushner and Smith called for radical socialist change, and an eradication all of the – isms's in this country.

I know there are many differences between people within the queer community. It was incredibly inspiring to me to hear two completely different people calling for the same type of drastic change. Kushner quoted C.K. Chesterton at the end of his speech, saying "The optimist is a better reformer than the pessimist." I feel that this phrase gave many people in the audience a new sense of hope for their ability to change things.

ARTS & LIVING

Rare Picasso works at MET

By Sara Silver
Associated Press

NEW YORK — To get a sense of the ceramics of Pablo Picasso, imagine the curves of a vase turning into a bikini-clad woman. Or picture a plate with fish and fork baked on its surface, or a pitcher spouting the beak and plumes of a fantastic bird.

The full range of the cubist master's ceramics — some of his most playful and accessible works — are on display until June 6 at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in an exhibition called Picasso: Painter and Sculptor in Clay. The show features work that was long derided by critics as superficial.

Organized by the Royal Academy of Arts in London, the exhibit includes more than 175 rarely exhibited works that Picasso made after World War II in southern France.

"Picasso's involvement was so profound and personal — as well as being unfashionable at the time — that, until recently, it went unrecognized as a significant part of his oeuvre," writes his son, Claude Picasso, in an essay introducing the exhibit.

Gouging scenes of bullfights into flat plates, washing blue tints of cubist nudes over tiles, or wrapping a yellow bikini around a red earthenware vase, Picasso made thousands of ceramics that bear his iconic imagery and signature techniques.

Gone are the bleak wartime images he produced while trapped in Nazi-occupied Paris.

"Picasso's years in the south of France were among his happiest, and exuberant joy and Mediterranean light are reflected in the painted three-dimensional sculptures he created in clay," writes Philippe de Montebello, director of the Met.

Picasso began working intensively in ceramic in 1946 at the Madoura pottery workshop in Vallauris at the invitation of owners Georges and Suzanne Ramie.

Painting and sculpting vessels made by Madoura artisans, he reinvented the technical aspects of painting on clay, decorating press-molded plates by mixing enamels with oxides and glazes whose colors surfaced only after firing.

He molded fish and a lemon slice, and fried eggs and sausage, onto platters to create his version of the Spanish "platos de engano" ("plates to fool the eye"), and he created large-scale mosaics out of a few multicolored tiles.

He pulled hips and breasts from curvy vases fresh off the potter's wheel, and made sketches for skilled Madoura artisans to turn into jugs he would later paint as kneeling goats or birds being tossed into the air.

"Carried away by his vital need to discover all, he suddenly succumbed with infinite delight to the temptation... to penetrate the mystery of earth and fire," wrote Georges Ramie in his 1974 book, "Picasso's Ceramics," published in French the year after Picasso died at 91.

Picasso worked in what Ramie called a fury of incessant activity, creating so many pieces that they were stacked in piles on the floor — despite their value.

The artist remade classical ceramic forms in his own image. He painted his profile on fragments like those found in Etruscan tombs, sculpted his lovers into hourglass-shaped Tanagra vases of the Hellenistic period, molded his beloved flute players around Greek-style amphorae.

Picasso put much of his daily life into the ceramics, incising the ballet of the Sunday bullfights he saw, reprinting the communist newspapers he read, pressing the bones of fish he ate for lunch into wet clay. In his clay works, he both celebrated and dominated his companion, Francoise Gilot, mother of Claude.

He glorifies her beauty throughout his clay works, but painted her portrait on the flame side of two casserole pots. William S. Lieberman, a curator of the Met exhibit, notes that what appears to be a birthmark at the corner of her mouth in an earthenware mask actually represents the burn mark left on Gilot after Picasso once took a cigarette to her face.

This full view of Picasso's life today emerges from the ceramic medium, which London-based scholar Marilyn McCully notes, enabled Picasso to paint in the round: fish swimming, snakes slithering down jugs, mythological figures chasing one another around a vase.

And it is thanks to this new appreciation of his long ignored work that visitors to the exhibit, which ends in New York City, can also see an extra dimension of Picasso's work, the original way he shaped ceramic forms.

"While Picasso had the ability to respect and follow the traditions of ceramics from ancient times through its present popular form, he was also able to reinvent the medium with enormous enthusiasm and originality by painting and sculpting in clay on his own terms," says McCully.

UMass crew to host four

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

The party is over.

Tomorrow at 10 a.m., the Massachusetts women's crew team, who cruised through their season opener, will face unfriendly foes from BU, BC, UNH, and Kanvas on the Connecticut River. Each opponent will be looking to steal a big victory against the three-time Atlantic 10 champions. It's either going to be a coming-out party for UMass' first home meet or a disaster at hand.

"I am a little nervous, we only have a few days to get prepared," UMass coach Jim Dietz said of his team, currently ranked sixth in the country by Independent Rowing's coaches poll and ninth in the nation by US Rowing's coaches poll.

"BU has a lot of scholarship athletes," Dietz said. "They have been at [rowing competition] for a long time. They really get up for us because we are probably the top race on their schedule for the year. [In fact] everybody is going to be shooting at us. We are the biggest race in everyone's schedule[in the Northeast region]."

Added Dietz: "We can't take a loss in any preseason race. To guarantee an NCAA selection, it is better if we can go undefeated through the season."

That undefeated prospect adds a lot of pressure on the Minutewomen. However, they are accustomed to that. Four returnees from last year's runner-up squad in the NCAA's are back, including captain Neyla Leslie, Michelle Archer, Tamara Surattic and Amy Lawless, all of whom have faced all the adversities they have been presented with. Besides, the Minutewomen are finally back into their own backyard.

"Getting back to our water, we feel much more comfortable," Leslie said.

However, the current on the Connecticut River has been very unstable. That has caused some concern. Additionally, this is a race which is short and begins from a dead stop, meaning the Minutewomen need to focus on being fast and quick. They also need to focus on breaking into their newer and better boats.

"We only row our good boats in the spring," Dietz said. "[We're] moving from the older boat to our newer boat, and that's the challenge — to get everybody comfortably [fit] into the boat."

Sophomore coxswain Sara Pragluski will get her first start at home with the varsity boat. She will be one of the keys to victory for UMass. If she remains calm and directs the boat with precision, UMass, which is loaded with powerful women, will be dangerous this weekend.

"Hopefully, we will be able to relax," Dietz said. "That's what I like to see. If you try too hard, it sometimes works against you."

Men's tennis squad prepares to take on Colgate, St. Bonavenure

By James Piehl
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team is hoping to overcome injuries again and carry last weekend's victories over Maryland and George Washington into this weekend's matchups with Colgate and St Bonaventure.

The men's squad will be playing without Todd Champeau, who has a pulled muscle in his back, and are waiting to hear if Parsa Samii will be able to join the roster. Samii jammed his thumb in practice yesterday and is questionable until the results of his X-rays determine if he'll play.

"If we lose both of them [Champeau and Samii] it will be a huge blow to us," UMass coach Judy Dixon said.

The Minutemen face not only the challenge of rising above the injuries but also history. They are 0-4 against Red Raiders all-time but have been playing well lately.

"At full strength we can definitely beat them," Dixon said.

Also adding to the UMass woes is the difficulty of Colgate's courts.

"They have an indoor/outdoor tennis court with a carpet- like material that is very hard to play on," Dixon said.

After their match against Colgate at 12 p.m. the men's squad will be ready to face Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure. The Minutemen are favored against the Bonnies and are 2-0 all-time versus them.

The team has squeaked out 4-3 victories against St. Bonaventure in the past but is a stronger team this year.

The Minutemen are ranked in the top four in the Atlantic 10 and the Bonnies are somewhere in the back of the pack.

Coach Dixon attributes UMass' strength to its depth, which is also the Bonnies' weakness.

The squad has been having double practices for the past two weeks. It has also been practicing in excess of four and a half hours a day, including a recent trip to Florida.

The Minutemen have been playing well and are looking to stay healthy for their upcoming matches.

Minutemen Notes: This is Dixon's sixth year as head coach of the men's tennis program. She is currently 63-44 all-time with a .589 win percentage and is looking to improve on this spring's 2-5 record.

UM women's tennis team hopes to get on track at Bonaventure

By Jason Owens
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team enters a match this weekend as the favorite for only the second time this season. The first time was against Fordham, and it stands as the only victory for the Minutewomenin the young spring season.

The team has emerged from what could only be described as a "killer" early season schedule battered and bruised, but now, with the bulk of their tough out of conference matches behind them, they represent a thoroughly experienced and battle-tested team that is poised to make a run at the Atlantic-10 championship.

"We need a win," UMass women's tennis coach Judy Dixon said.

At 1-4, the Minutewomen enter the match as favorites, but their coach isn't sure if the team remembers what it's like to get a victory when it's expected.

"We need to remember what a good team we are," Dixon said. "We are the same team that beat Army, Air Force, and Temple this fall. "If we play to our abilities, we should win."

The season has taken a dramatic turn for the team, who, in their first five matches, faced four powerhouses, getting shutout in three times. Now all of a sudden, the Minutewomen are the favorites.

"We've got the bull's eye on our back," said Dixon, referring to their upcoming A-10 schedule.

Favorites aside, going into Colgate and expecting an easy victory would be a mistake, and Dixon knows it.

"Colgate's tough. We beat them last year when we probably shouldn't have. Their home court is not designed specifically for tennis. It's a general athletic surface," she said. "That makes it a certain advantage for them. Person for person, match for match, we look good, but we have to play."

Their upset victory over Colgate last season should serve as a reminder of the thin line between underdog and favorite, though it is a line that becomes more defined when UMass roles into St. Bonaventure on Sunday.

"[St. Bonaventure] isn't as strong as Colgate," Dixon said. "They have a nice team, but they don't take their tennis program as seriously as UMass does, and we should win."

It is rare thing for a team to start a season 1-4 and still be optimistic, but Dixon is well aware of the precarious nature of the team's situation.

"We expect to win both matches this weekend," she said. "We're playing well, we're practicing well and it's important that we use us being favored as an advantage. It's time to take care of business."

UMass ready to rock in Atlantic 10

By Matt Melo
Collegian Staff

It was a bittersweet end to a week spent in the sunny climates of California, a span of seven days which has brought the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team back to reality while in preparation for this weekend's Atlantic 10 Championships in Philadelphia.

The week was bittersweet in that UMass (9-6 Overall 4-0 A-10) suffered two narrow defeats at the hands of Stanford and Cal-State Sacramento. But the silver lining shined in the form of UMass scoring well enough to qualify for the NCAA Regionals, which follow the A-10's in April.

Tomorrow's conference meet pits the likes of George Washington, Rhode Island, and Temple against the favored Minutewomen.

Conversely, George Washington has earned the number- one ranking for the meet with UMass slipping into the second slot followed by URI and Temple. Neither the rankings nor the competition overall worries UMass coach Dave Kuzara and the prospects he envisions for his squad.

This is the healthiest we've been, but I hate to say it because every time I do someone sprains an ankle or something," he said. "I feel were doing the best gymnastics of the year and we are by far in better shape than we've been all year, which I think is going to pay off."

"Our depth is key as of now. We have depth whereas all year we've been battling with five or six athletes, trying to find a sixth," added Kuzara. "Now we're looking to warm up eight on each event."

On top of depth and team cohesiveness, Kuzara points to the rotation of events favoring the Minutewomen. UMass will start on its strongest three events — the bars, beam, and floor, respectively, before wrapping up on the vault. Consolation, however, could come in the fact that the Minutewomen scored a season high on the vault with a 48.325 against a good Stanford club.

"We start on uneven bars, which has been better for us in the second half, then to the beam. And I promise you if we hit bars and do well and hit beam, no one is going to catch us," Kuzara said.

Overall, the keys to success according to Kuzara include getting out to a good start and putting pressure on the other teams.

"The first event will dictate what happens the rest of the meet," he said. "We end on the vault. By that time if we are in the lead, it's not going to be a weakness because everyone will be fired up. We've struggled on vault all year. But we are improving and the athletes have done well."

This, in turn, will allow Kuzara to implement his simple game plan.

"Hopefully [we will] have a nice two point lead going into the vault and do our job there and get out of Philly," he said.

Summer session on the Boulder campus is something special. With over 500 campus courses to choose from, it's a relaxed, comfortable learning environment. Classes are smaller. And when you're not in class, you can soak up Boulder's mellow charm. Or explore Boulder's backyard, a high country playground that includes some of the country's most rugged and spectacular terrain.

VISITING STUDENTS: Take advantage of CU resources to complete or enrich your own degree program.

HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS: Take a college course for experience, to enhance your college application, or to see if CU is the right school for you.

TEACHERS: Earn recertification credits and tap into everything the University has to offer.

PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT: Increase your knowledge base and build skills to enhance your capabilities.

ENRICHMENT: Give yourself the pleasure of an academic challenge at CU this summer.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Take care that you're not trying to manufacture other people's responses to your affairs today. Stick to the rules at all times.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — There's no room for teasing of any kind today. Someone close to you is in need of positive support, and he or she doesn't need any insincerity.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You must direct your anger today at those who have deserved it in the past, not to those you fear will offend you in the future.

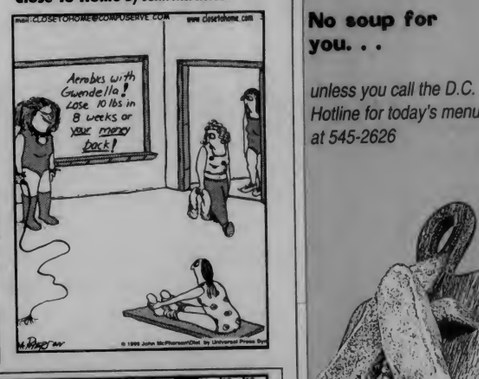
CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Your connection with someone who is more established will surely enable you to advance yourself with greater ease today. Don't be too cocky!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — An unpleasant interruption at just the "wrong time" today is likely to teach you an important lesson. Once over the line, you can't go back!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Competition is likely to be tough today, but your experience will serve you well. You have every reason to remain confident, optimistic, and energized!

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Invest a little more time and money at this time and the results will please you and your critics. Rewards are sure to be forthcoming.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — The time has come for you to arm yourself for the challenge that is just around the corner. Any further delays can prove disastrous for you.



SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — They say that you "can't go home again," but you may be able to make some overdue repairs on a key relationship today. Take that first step.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You can put on quite a show today, but you must be sure that you're being true to yourself, even when indulging in the melodramatic.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You can recognize the problem with ease today, and solve it permanently with only a modicum of effort. Otherwise, you can avoid the whole thing and suffer!

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may have more to sing about today than others can glean. It would be wise to keep your little secret for a while longer.

Minutemen host ECAC tonight

UM looking to advance to NCAA Regionals

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

The day of reckoning is here and the fate of the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team will be decided as it competes in the ECAC Championships tonight at 7 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center.

UMass takes on arch rival Temple University as well as Army, William and Mary, Navy, Springfield College, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Southern Connecticut State University, James Madison University and Illinois. These 10 teams are all fighting for the first-place spot, which would guarantee the winner a spot at NCAA Regionals, to be held on April 10 in Champagne, Illinois.

Among the predicted top finishers of the meet are junior Jeff LaVallee and senior captain Stephen Pryor.

"[Either of] the two could finish in the top three," said coach Roy Johnson. "Jeff has been feeling really good about his routines and Steve has been having some of the best practices of his life."

Although UMass has high hopes about taking the top three individual spots as well as the first place team title, one gymnast in particular can give them a run for the money. That man is Mike Moran, LaVallee's former teammate and backbone for Temple University. Moran could easily take the top spot and help lead his team to victory.

Temple has won the ECAC's many times in the past, leaving UMass with the silver, but the Maroon and White remain confident and optimistic.

"Everyone has been working really hard in the gym," Pryor said. "We are a much tighter team now, and each guy pushes the next during practice to help keep the momentum going. This is typically Temple's best meet, but I think we'll take them down."

Pryor has always been a great contributor to the squad and has been team captain for two consecutive years. Walking away as ECAC Champions and moving on to Regionals would be a great accomplishment to this talented team.

"I'm more excited about this meet than any other competition I've ever participated in," Pryor said. "This will be my last championship meet, and if we win, it will be our first time ever to make it to Regionals as a team."

While UMass has always sent individual athletes on to NCAA Regionals and Nationals, as a team the Minutemen have always been on the sidelines. But with the many talented athletes competing this year, UMass gymnastics history could be made tonight.

"[Sophomore] Bryan McNulty and [senior] Dan Young look fantastic on floor," Johnson said. "[Sophomore] J.J. Hershey, [senior] Brad LeClair and [freshman] Matt Plumser are looking really good on pommel horse. And of course, [sophomore] Andy Leis, who's one of the best in the nation on pommels, is also in great shape."

The top eight finishers on each of the six events— but no more than three per school— move on to the final round of competition tomorrow at 2 p.m. for the ECAC individual event finals. Senior Phil Lieberman has taken the floor title in the past and he, along with the rest of the team, hopes to make his mark at the meet.

"Our focus going into this meet is on performance," Johnson said.

And with focus and great performances, the Minutemen will make history and join the other six teams at the NCAA Eastern Regionals in two weeks.

Minutemen Notes: One of the most dedicated gymnasts in American history, Shannon Miller, will be a commentator at the meet, which is to be aired on NESN in 15 million homes across the eastern seaboard. The two-time Olympic gold- medal-winning star will also be having an autograph session early in the evening.

This is the first nationally televised gymnastics meet ever at UMass — one of many new quirks for the team since the UMass Athletic Program accepted money donated to the eastern conference. Tickets for the meet can be obtained at the Mullins Center box office.

UM, rival Hofstra ready for lax match

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Five goals. Three overtimes. One tournament game.

Want to talk dead-even rivalry? How about the Massachusetts and Hofstra men's lacrosse teams? Over the last three years the two teams have played one of the hardest fought, most intense lax series in the Northeast, if not the nation.

Three years ago, Hofstra claimed a 15-14 win in Hempstead, N.Y. When the teams met in New York in 1997, the Flying Dutchmen claimed a 7-6 double-overtime victory. In the NCAA quarterfinals, however, it was UMass' turn and the Minutemen took a 6-4 decision at Army's Michie Stadium. Last year in Amherst, the Minutemen again ruled in a close one, 7-6.

Tomorrow, the 1999 installment of the series will get underway at 1:30 p.m. at Hofstra Stadium (WMUA 91.1 FM will have the pregame starting at 1:15 p.m.).

"We have quite a rivalry, because we're both at the same level," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "This is a big game for most of our guys, because about 50 percent of our guys are from Long Island. That makes this game big for bragging rights, team-wise and individually."

In order to hold on to those bragging rights for another season, No. 20 Massachusetts (2-2) will have to bounce back from last week's 15-6 loss to No. 4 Virginia. Hofstra (2-2), meanwhile, is coming off a 19-5 win over Air Force, but the Flying Dutchmen are accustomed to facing top-level talent. In their first game of the season, Hofstra dropped a 10-4 decision to now No. 1 Loyola.

"Hofstra is very intense. We talked to the Loyola coaches and they said Hofstra was one of the most intense teams they have faced," Cannella said. "But I think games like that help both of us. Anytime you play someone tough, it helps you."

It can especially help when a team doesn't have a veteran roster. Only four starters return from last year, but those who have filled the holes have paid dividends for the Dutchmen. Doug Shanahan, a sophomore midfielder, has eight points on four goals and four assists on the year, while freshmen Joe Kostolansky and Tom Kessler have six and five points, respectively. Seniors Chad Eisenhart (eight points) and Brad Obloj (seven points) lead the attack-minded offense.

"Last year and this year, they have pushed the tempo, they've played in transition and they've run," Cannella said. "They will fast break and jam it down your throat. They still play an attacking style defense that puts pressure on the ball."

UMass, meanwhile, plays a deliberate style of offense that has translated into 10 goals for Rich Kunkel and seven apiece for John Madigan and Jeremy Guski.

A major point of concentration for both teams tomorrow will be faceoffs. Both Hofstra and UMass have won over 61 percent of their faceoffs, even though the Minutemen have handled most of theirs by committee.

"Hofstra has two of the top faceoff guys in the country," Cannella said. "They've done a great job winning. We'll use David Kramer and J.T. [Benazzi] and some other guys and find out if someone's hot."

UMass baseball set to face Bulldogs

By Michael Kobylanski

The talk in Connecticut this weekend will surely revolve around one thing — the UConn men's basketball's first ever trip to the Final Four.

Tomorrow night's tipoff, however, will mean little to the Massachusetts and Yale baseball teams, who will square off for three games over a span of two days. The two clubs will play a doubleheader on Saturday at Yale Field in West Haven, Conn., and will return back to Amherst for a single game. The first pitch is scheduled for noon on both days.

UMass (6-7) is coming off an 8-7 victory over Holy Cross on Wednesday afternoon in Worcester. However, the play of the Minutemen has not been up to par, according to UMass baseball coach Mike Stone.

"Our play was average [against Holy Cross]. The weather might have been an equalizer because it was a lousy day, but I'm not trying to make any excuses," he said. "We let them hang around and we didn't put them away. Basically we played to the level of our opponent."

The Minutemen have not defeated a squad this season with a winning record, and may once again overpower a Yale squad that has struggled so far.

"We're supposed to beat a team like Holy Cross, and we barely did," Stone said. "In fact, we were lucky to survive with the way the game ended [called because of darkness and rain]."

The sub-.500 mark, though, concerns Stone, who doesn't want his team to underestimate the Elis.

"Traditionally Yale is a good Ivy League team," he said. "They've played some tough teams early on, and I expect them to be a real good club."

UMass has been led offensively by senior third baseman Bryan Mazzaferro. The reigning Atlantic 10 Player of the Week is coming off a three hit performance against the Crusaders on Wednesday. Senior catcher Brian Samela has also been hot of late, connecting for two home runs in as many games.

Junior Travis Veracka, sophomore David Loonie and senior co-captain Bill Cooke will each get a start this weekend against the Bulldogs. Veracka will start game one on Saturday, and brings a 1-1 mark and 4.20 earned run average into the contest.

Loonie, who was impressive in his last outing, will take the ball in the back end of the double-dip on Saturday. The Longmeadow product sports a 1-1 record along with a solid 2.10 ERA. Cooke, the veteran of the staff, earned his first win of the season in a relief appearance last week.

The Bulldogs are coming back home after an unsuccessful Southern trip over spring break. Yale defeated Sacred Heart University last weekend, and will use the Minutemen as a final tune-up before the Ivy League portion of its schedule begins.

Although the Elis have a balanced offensive attack, their pitching staff is anchored by freshman Jon Steitz, a Branford, Conn. native who was selected in the later rounds of the Amateur Draft last spring.

Tomorrow's game will also give the Minutemen the chance to play at historic Yale Field, home of the New Haven Ravens. The Ravens are the Double-A affiliate of the Seattle Mariners.

"It's always nice for the ballplayers to play in a nice ballpark," Stone said. "That should give them some extra motivation."

Women's lacrosse goes to SU

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

On the Massachusetts women's lacrosse schedule, tomorrow's matchup at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse, N.Y., against the Orangewomen is labeled as an "away" game. In the minds of many Minutewomen, however, the contest will be viewed as a home game. Regardless, it is agreed that this face-off is a big one.

Despite the time spent travelling countless hours on a bus to reach the site of the game, UMass expects to see nearly as much maroon and white inside the arena as they will bright orange. Several Minutewomen call New York their home, and their family and friends plan to occupy the dome on Saturday. Who says Syracuse is a tough place to play?

"There's five of us from around that town," UMass senior co-captain Melissa Anderson said. "Three that went to high school together — Sara [MacNabb], Jessica [Passanese] and myself — and then Noelle [Gorski] and Rachel [Ingraffea]. We're all from the Syracuse area, so there will be tons of people there in the dome."

UMass Coach Francesca McClellan added: "We are definitely looking forward to playing Syracuse. It's going to be a fun, exciting game."

Anderson, MacNabb and Passanese all played their high school lacrosse for C.W. Baker, while Gorski and Ingraffea hail from Cicero, N.Y., and Ithaca, N.Y., respectively. Defenders Kara DePaula and Lynne Young are among the remaining five New Yorkers on the UMass roster, both from Saratoga Springs.

Still, although the support will be there, the game needs to be played.

"I'm going home to New York, and I've got a lot of family coming," Young said. "That's kind of not in my mind, though. Just the game last year — there's so many emotions wrapped up in this game. We're going to go out and give it our best. I think last year we over-prepared for it."

"With Syracuse, there's just so much emotion going into that," McClellan said. "We'll definitely be up for that."

In that game last year, the Minutewomen hosted Syracuse, and held the nation's highest-scoring offense to only eight points, but came up on the short end of a two-goal loss.

This year, the Orangewomen again command the respect of a nationally powerhouse. However, the eager UMass squad is returning nearly all of their fire-power in the form of four of 1998's top five scorers.

In addition, Ingraffea and junior Rebecca Minaker have come from out of the shadows to emerge as dominant offensive players.

"It's going to be a great game, and its going to be a close game just like it was last year," Anderson said. "Except this time we'll win, hopefully."

The defensive unit that kept 'Cuse in check will be missing only two from last season. Amy Leder was the single graduate from the crowd that can still boast two-time Northeast All-American Young. Passanese and Melissa Miele, among others.

Junior Colleen Wales, who recorded an assist in last year's battle, is the only member of this year's team that won't take the turf, as she suffered a knee injury in last Saturday's game against New Hampshire.

While the Minutewomen are looking to improve to 4-1 on the season, there's a little more on the line in this contest than just record and ranking.

McClellan hinted that a handful of New York recruits are being sought by both Massachusetts and Syracuse, and this game will likely help those prospects currently riding the fence. Although the next few months will ultimately decide which of the two schools has the brighter future, a victory on Saturday is expected to play a sizeable role in determining that.

No. 9 UMass ready to battle Harvard

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

While most of their peers were relaxing in the spring break sun, the Massachusetts women's water polo team was doing battle in California last week.

After taking on some of the nation's elite, the No. 9 Minutewomen have returned to familiar soil and will look to continue their dominance of the East when they take on No. 20 Harvard today.

UMass rebounded from a somewhat disappointing (2-4) six-day West Coast swing by going undefeated in its first four games of Collegiate Water Polo Association league play. The Maroon and White showed great poise and confidence in knocking off Dartmouth, Wesleyan, Brown, and Mount Holyoke to run its season record to 13-4 overall.

And while the homecoming itself provided a fantastic boost to the team's confidence, the experiences garnered in California played a huge part in UMass' renewed success.

"We reached a new level of play on that trip," said UMass coach Dan McOsker, last year's CWPA Eastern Coach of the Year. "Hopefully, we can keep up that level on the East Coast."

The Minutewomen can attribute much of their improvement to the rock-solid play of their core of junior leaders. Co-captains Claudia Clement and All-American Katie Grogan have meshed their aggressive styles with the stellar scoring of Ohio native Marci Hupp to form the East's most dominant offense.

But both the players and their coach agree that defense has been the key for UMass, as demonstrated by the team's meager 4.5 goals-against average. The vaunted front-and-lanes defense preached by McOsker has been executed flawlessly by the likes of juniors Laurie Edwards and Sarah Newell, and freshman field player Jacqui Goodhue.

"Jacqui has really been a force for us," McOsker said. "We're counting on her to continue playing great defense."

Other freshmen making an immediate impact for the Maroon and White include Anne Dettloff, Alexa Olsen, and goalkeeper Dana Sinkwich. Michigan native Dettloff led the team in goals during last weekend's tourney with nine, while Californian Olsen tallied six. Fellow Golden State native Sinkwich has racked up 16 saves and a mere 3.25 goals- against average in league play in '99, including seven saves against Brown.

"Dana is another player who really stepped it up for us out in California," McOsker said.

Despite their unparalleled success thus far in '99, the Minutewomen aren't about to rest on their laurels just yet. As a matter of fact, McOsker is making a priority of taking each game as it comes, and not looking ahead.

"Right now, we've got to maintain our focus," McOsker said. "Harvard is going to be really geared up to play us."

The Minutewomen will follow up the Harvard contest by competing in a CWPA New England Division Tournament this weekend at Providence, R.I.

UMass boasts a startling 20-0 record all-time in the CWPA, including a 7-0 record in 1997 and a 9-0 mark in 1998. The Minutewomen captured the CWPA New England Championship Tournament title in both of those seasons.

UM softball streaking into Princeton

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

The record of the Massachusetts softball team after 19 games last season: 9-10.

Its mark at the end on last season was 45-14 — a season which culminated with a trip to the Women's College World Series.

The Minutewomen's sub-.500 mark at the start of 1998 wasn't because the team was struggling. It was due to its very aggressive early-season schedule. And after another 19- game grueling stretch to begin its 1999 campaign, UMass stands at a remarkable 13-6, and is poised to continue the sudden spark when it travels to New Jersey this weekend for the Princeton Invitational.

The Ivy League Tigers will play host to a four-team tournament field which will feature themselves along with Hofstra and UConn. The Minutewomen are slated to meet the border-rival Huskies tomorrow at 9:30 a.m. and then Princeton at 1:30.

The Minutewomen will play the Hofstra Flying Dutchwomen Sunday morning at 9:30 to decide the final seedings of the tournament. The top two seeds will meet for the title at 3:30 p.m. after the 1:30 p.m. consolation contest.

"This weekend, we're heading down to the toughest tournament in the Northeast," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said at the Wednesday media luncheon. "[With teams such as] Princeton, UConn, Hofstra and UMass, it should be a great tournament for us. We're looking forward to playing."

The Princeton Invitation marks the final early-season tournament for UMass, which will focus largely on Atlantic 10 Conference for the remainder of the regular campaign. Sortino believes that success in such invitations, as she her team has had this season, will help bolster its reputation and place it among the nation's best. Whereas the Minutewomen were once invited as a puthover team, they have now become a squad that brings fear to the eyes of their opponents.

"The contract is still the same, but the invitation and the embrace is a little different. We used to be contacted as a team that [our opponents] could say goodbye to because nobody really thought we could play with them," Sortino said. "And now, we're looking [to become] the team [that other schools] are looking to bring in to make [a tournament] field part of the elite."

The Minutewomen will enter the weekend round-robin with a full head of steam. Sortino's squad is riding high after a victory over defending National Champion and No. 3 ranked Fresno State. One of the most promising attributes of her 1999 team is its youth. With a roster comprised of mostly underclassmen, the 19-year coaching veteran was encouraged by the Minutewomen's ability to win, but didn't hesitate to cite some of their innocently amusing faults.

"There are seven freshmen on this year's team. Between those seven, and the four sophomores, we are an underclassmen team of 11 out of the 16 positions that we have," she said. "So this a very, very young softball team, and I'll be very honest with you — on a day to day basis, they don't know what the hell they're doing."

Howe is president Avakian is trustee

KARA STOREY/ COLLEGIAN

Jeffrey Howe and Seth Avakian were elected SGA president and Student trustee, respectively.

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Jeffrey Howe and Seth Avakian have won the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) President and Trustee positions, however the results will not be official until they are ratified at Wednesday's SGA meeting.

Students turned out in larger numbers than last year with 16.8 percent casting ballots this year versus 13 percent last year. Howe, a junior political science major, won the presidency with 828 votes. Jim Eltringham, the runner-up, came in with 745 votes.

Avakian, a senior political science major, finished up as student trustee with 869 votes. Malika Tafawa came in second by a very close margin with 819 votes.

Both Howe and Avakian are experienced in the SGA and ready to be sworn into their new positions.

"My role starts a lot sooner then Avakian's if all goes well as we're hoping. The election will be ratified Wednesday and I'll start on April 1. Seth will remain a senator and work closely with Elly Court, the present trustee, to learn the in's and out's of the job, and then take office June 1," Howe said.

Howe has served as a senator from Orchard Hill Residential Area for two years and this year he is the area governor of Orchard Hill. In addition, Howe is also the coordinator for the judicial advisors program for the Dean of Students.

Avakian is a senator from Commuter Area and a judicial advisor for the SGA. He has also held positions on residential committees and served as the chair of the Ways and Means Committee.

As the new SGA administration they plan to stick to the platform they campaigned with.

"We made promises and we will do everything to get things done. We will stick to our platform, we will not forget what we promised," Howe said.

Chhim identified as Cashin shooter As witness testifies on day 4 of trial

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Former University of Massachusetts student Joshua Massin stepped down from the witness stand Friday morning to identify Sokha Chhim, the Amherst high school student accused of shooting Russell Bishop in Cashin Residence Hall Oct. 30.

After briefly wandering around the courtroom, Massin stopped a few feet away from the defense table and stared at Chhim for a full minute before identifying him as the man who shot his best friend.

He then returned to the stand and took a drink of water as he described what happened that night. He said Chhim and another man arrived as the two were eating steaks Massin had prepared earlier at a fraternity house where he worked as a chef. Massin said he was briefly introduced to Chhim, who came to buy four ounces of marijuana.

Massin concentrated on his dinner while the marijuana transaction took place, not wanting to get involved. He heard Chhim complain that Bishop had weighed out the marijuana prior to his arrival.

"Things moved quickly from there," Massin said. "The next thing I remember was a gun being drawn from his [Chhim's] right side... He held it strong-armed [completely extended arm] towards Russell at point-blank range [aimed] between his head and chest."

Massin, an experienced marksman, was able to describe the weapon as a "compact semi-automatic pistol, polished stainless steel or nickel plated."

The shooter then said "Freeze mother fucker!" or "Die mother fucker!" and "Russell stood up and tried to struggle," Massin said.

"He [Bishop] appeared to knock the gun off its aim. The shooter then corrected his aim [and brought the gun] very close, if not on his neck," Massin continued. "I heard a shot and sat there in disbelief. I saw Russell fall to the floor lifelessly, like a rag doll."

The shooter stepped back and looked down at Bishop, while Massin remained frozen on the bed.

The shooter then looked up at Massin and turned the gun on him.

"I started begging for my life, curled into a fetal position facing toward the wall," Massin said. He couldn't see what happened behind him, but continued to beg. "I was more interested in becoming part of that wall if I could," he said.

Finally he heard footsteps running down the hall, peeked over his shoulder and sat up again.

"I heard Russell under me telling me he had been shot," Massin said. "I looked over the side of the bed and saw a stream of blood squirting up the side of his neck. His speech sounded as if he was being strangled. I started to apply pressure with my bare hands. He told me to call 911."

Chhim's attorney, Joseph A. Franco, questioned Massin's ability to identify the shooter. He noted that Massin did not watch the drug transaction take place; Bishop's back was turned toward him; the room was dimly lit at the time; Massin continuously described the shooter as Hispanic. Chhim is Cambodian. The in-trial identification was the first time Massin had positively identified Chhim as the shooter.

Franco earlier had challenged Bishop's memory of what happened that evening, arguing that he had smoked "quite a bit" of marijuana and was "quite stoned."

He asked Bishop what time he had started smoking marijuana that day, and Bishop replied, "I smoked a lot of marijuana... probably when I first woke up."

"It was very good marijuana, wasn't it?" Franco asked Bishop. He then suggested that Bishop was very high at the time of the shooting, which affected his mental capacity and time perception.

Bishop said that he has been a long-time habitual marijuana smoker and has developed a high tolerance for the drug. "I haven't noticed the problem [with memory]."

"Doesn't time go by slower? Doesn't music sound better [when you're high]?" Franco asked him.

"Music sounds good to me all the time," Bishop replied.

Franco continued to question Bishop's ability to remember everything that happened.

"I think it was because I was shot," Bishop replied dryly. "It's a traumatic event."

He added that he was a Dean's List student, and "could remember enough to get a 3.5 [GPA] in engineering. It doesn't pose much of a problem."

Franco then attempted to point out inconsistencies between Bishop's testimony and earlier written and verbal statements.

Bishop responded, "I had a hole in my neck. I had other things to worry about."

Students in workshop hope for the best

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Forty students willing to get arrested in order to change the current admissions policy spent their Saturday learning how to practice civil disobedience instead of violent confrontation.

Undergraduate and graduate students from each of the five colleges in the area attended the all-day civil disobedience workshop held in the Commonwealth Room of the Student Union.

The group discussed the philosophy and history of non-violence and the role of peacekeeping during acts of civil disobedience. University of Massachusetts student organizers also presented an update on affirmative action admissions and attempted to deconstruct common myths about the issue.

"I feel there is a lot of fear and misinformation about direct action and civil disobedience," said UMass graduate student Jennifer Fanuko.

Kiya Stokes, a graduate student and member of the steering committee of the Task Force for Equal Opportunity and Access for All People, stressed that acts of civil disobedience are acts of bravery. "Many people try to paint people who use it as a tactic as cowards. But it's more brave, for example, to face a [mob of angry] racists in Mississippi without a gun than with a gun."

The group also discussed how to reach the majority of students on the UMass campus who are uninformed or indifferent to their cause.

"Public opinion is a powerful force in implementing social action," said Felice Yenkel, one of the women who facilitated the workshop and has past involvement in civil rights activism. "The goal is not to get arrested. Often [people think the goal is] to try to get arrested for media attention."

"The best actions are well-crafted and clearly defined," and the participants are clear about the power structure they are trying to attack," she said. "You have to keep in mind who is watching, what they are seeing, and [ask] will they get educated?" she added.

Participant Rene Gonzalez agreed, and stressed that although "the risk is there and people know they could be arrested for what they are doing," arrest is not the goal of any action the group may take.

He emphasized that the workshop was given as a preventative measure, so that students understand what civil disobedience means and learn methods of non-violent protest.

Some students, however, expressed a desire for action, and said they felt the protests thus far have been moving too slowly. UMass student David Minasian said, "In our context, a crucial step needs to be made... to escalate this."

The group discussed current strategies and brainstormed about future action. No consensus was reached, however, and students will continue to meet throughout the week.

If action were to take place this week, it would be the first time the University picketing code would be challenged. The code states that "all students, undergraduate and graduate, have a right to demonstrate on University premises provided, however, that no such demonstration shall be permissible which for any reason of time, place, or type of behavior materially disrupts class work or other University business, or involves substantial disorder or invasion of the rights of others."

Students who violate the code may not only be arrested, they may also be expelled from the University — a fact that concerned some of the workshop's participants.

Student charged with vandalism claims bathroom painting is artistic

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student was literally caught red-handed on March 19 after vandalizing a men's bathroom with red paint.

Police discovered large red arrows and footprints on the floor leading in and out of a bathroom in the Marshall Hall Annex, UMass Police Chief John Luippold said. Red paint was also splattered and smeared on the walls, and the words "Fun Booth 13" appeared on one of the stalls.

While assessing the damage, police heard someone in a nearby art studio and discovered Joshua J. Butkiewicz, hands and feet smeared with red paint. He acknowledged that he had painted the bathroom, and was arrested and charged with malicious destruction of property of more than $250, tagging property, and possession of a Class D substance, marijuana.

Butkiewicz, 22, from Athol, appeared in court that afternoon for his arraignment. He pled not guilty to all charges, and was released, promising to return to court on April 29 for a pre-trial hearing.

He defends his work, which was done as an "artistic installation" and was not meant to be malicious. Police have estimated that he caused more than $1,000 in damage to the bathroom, which had been painted by the physical plant two weeks earlier.

But Butkiewicz argues that he used tempera paint, which washes away with water, and offered to repaint the bathroom.

"I'm very, very sorry," he said. "I'm sorry that what I did pissed everyone off. I did not in any way mean for it to be malicious."

The case also raises questions about the application of the relatively new charge of tagging property. Luippold said the charge was applied to Butkiewicz because his painting fit the definition of tagging.

The charge applies to an incident in which the accused sprays or applies paint or places a sticker "upon a building wall, fence, sign, tablet, gravestone or other monument or other object or thing on a public way or adjoined to it, or in public view such persons commonly known as 'taggers' and such conduct or activity known or commonly known as tagging... with the intent to deface, mar, damage, mark or destroy such property."

A person convicted of tagging can face up to two years in jail and more than $1,500 in fines. In addition, he or she must pay restitution and may be subject to a one-year driver's license suspension.

The charge was created a few years ago to combat graffiti. But it does not include a provision for artistic expression, a point which Butkiewicz's attorney, Martine Reed, plans to challenge during the trial.

"We're definitely taking the position that what Joshua did was not vandalism," Reed said. "It's very unfortunate that kind of charge was applied. It stands to stifle free expression."

Drunk driver speaks out at MADD forum

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

(Editor's Note: Only the first names of some individuals are used to preserve anonymity.)

Consider for just one moment leaving a late night party after drinking and getting behind the wheel of a vehicle going 70-80 mph.

This was the fatal decision that was made by 17-year-old Craig on the evening of June 10, 1995. His vivid encounter with drunk driving was re-told Saturday in the Campus Center during a Mother's Against Drunk Driving (MADD) forum sponsored by University of Massachusetts Greek Affairs.

Koreen Butler, MADD victim services coordinator, reinforced the reality of drunken driving and the tragic impact it can have on friends and family of both victims and drunk drivers.

"Some of the people are here to share some of the worst moments of their lives and to help you so you don't have to go through what they did," Butler said. "I'm asking you to open your minds for a while and listen to what they have to say."

According to Craig, on his last day at Chicopee High School, he had attended a party. He consumed eight cans of beer within a two hour period, before deciding to drive home from the party along with two other passengers, one of whom was Jay.

None of the three teenagers riding in the vehicle were wearing seatbelts when the vehicle was traveling around 70- 80 mph around a turn. Craig missed a turn in the road causing his vehicle to slide 135 feet, before being flipped three times. Jay was thrown from the vehicle and was killed instantly from the car landing on him, Craig said. The third passenger survived the accident with serious injuries.

"Because of my irresponsibility and stupidity, a life was taken," Craig said. "It is scary to think about what they [Jay's family] are feeling."

Craig was charged with vehicular homicide and served 18 months in prison. He says his own life was ruined because of his decision to mix drinking and driving but his friend's life and dreams will be lost forever.

"I will appreciate staring out of my own window instead of a prison window," Craig said. "As for my friend, his dreams are gone forever."

Students stop to smell the roses

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

Therapy isn't just about couches anymore.

Mental health is being taken out of the office and into the garden as Durfee Conservatory director John Tristan and senior nursing honors student Chantale Duguay combine their interests to analyze students' perceptions of stress following what Duguay has termed a "horticultural intervention."

Beginning last week and continuing this week, the conservatory is playing host to aromatherapy tours led by Tristan, a certified horticultural therapist. Following each tour, a questionnaire designed by Duguay is given to participating students to assess their moods. The tours and questionnaires are part of Duguay's honors project.

Offering clippings of Rosemary and Citronella, Tristan guides students through the first room of the conservatory. He explains that certain smells cause chemical reactions in the pleasure centers of the brain, that, basically, "working with plants makes you feel better."

Tristan said Rosemary, "wakes you up." Citronella, with a "lemony, sweet" scent, keeps the bugs away. And in the tropical room, the second room of the conservatory, the Heliatrope smells like "marshmallows."

Moving into "The Jungle," students can anticipate falling in love, though not with the plants. The "flower of love," located near the "economic plants," the Chicle tree (chewing gum) and Cocoa tree (chocolate), is supposed to bring love to whoever smells it. Perhaps related, or perhaps not, Tristan explains that the Star of Annis has a relaxing effect, while ginger relieves nausea.

ROBERTO DEGADO/ COLLEGIAN

Students learn about plantlife in the Durfee Conservatory.

In the fourth room, students can touch the "sensitive plant," or Mimosa Pudica, whose leaves fold in after being touched.

Finally, students who like Thin Mint cookies can smell the "Girl Scout plant," the Mint Chocolate Geranium.

Tristan said smelling Mint Chocolate Geraniums or the Star of Annis can decrease students' stress.

Within four minutes of working with plants and interacting with the smells, blood pressure and heart rate decrease and the brain is "calmed," he said.

With eight percent of students using mental health services, Tristan said that the "haven" provided by Durfee is an alternative to traditional therapy.

Duguay's project will test this hypothesis. Though results will not be available until all the tours are completed and the questionnaires have been analyzed, the conservatory, located behind University Health Services, gives students a chance to escape stress, if only for the time it takes to stop and smell the flowers.

■ MADD

After serving his full sentence, Craig is still having a difficult time getting on with his career goals and life. He attended Springfield Technical Community College for two semesters before dropping out. He says the effect of the incident and having just been released from jail emotionally prevented him from concentrating on his academics.

At the cause of 22, Craig still hasn't been able to leave the past behind him and has yet to complete his college education. He reminds people not to take their lives for granted because it could be taken away from them at any time.

Jay's mother is accepting her son's death and the fact he will no longer be there when she walks past his bedroom.

"Imagine having to walk past an empty room everyday and witness my son Eric having to deal with his brother's death," she said. "We will forever have a void in our life and as a parent, no one expects you to stop partying. We just ask you take the time to give someone [designated driver] a call."

Guest speaker, Maria Torres, a Massachusetts State Trooper in Northampton discussed her experience in losing her mother to drunk driving.

Torres' mother was killed in January 1991 by a drunk convict driving a stolen vehicle. She says her involvement with MADD has been geared towards learning more about the laws of drunk driving and the need for more enforced laws.

"Drunk drivers need to know that when they get behind the wheel and kill someone or injure someone, there are consequences that they are not going to get away with," Torres said.

She and other MADD members are pushing for the state legislature to pass laws that would cause drunk drivers to lose their vehicles. A similar law exists in New York and Torres hopes similar states will implement stricter laws towards drunk driving.

"I hope I'm still here to see them changed," Torres said. "It's really devastating to lose someone like my mom who was very active and would have lived through many years, had someone not taken her life."

As for Craig, he must live his life knowing his actions are responsible for his friend's death. He wants people to know they don't have to make the same mistake he did.

"I'm 22 and saying I wish I could do high school over again," Craig said. "I'd rather be living a normal life. I would prefer to be somewhere else right now, but so would my friend."

U.S. plane crashes in Yugoslavia as NATO expands its air assault

By George Jahn
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — A U.S. stealth fighter was lost over Yugoslavia on Saturday night, as NATO expanded its air assault by ordering its forces to attack tanks, artillery and troops in Kosovo.

With thousands of Kosovo residents fleeing toward neighboring Albania, NATO Secretary-General Javier Solana said the stepped-up assault was needed to halt violence in the province and "prevent further humanitarian catastrophe."

A line of refugees stretched for a mile at Kosovo border post, watched by about 10 Yugoslav army soldiers holding machine guns. The fleeing ethnic Albanians told of roundups, forced expulsions and other brutal treatment by the Serbs.

On the first night intensified air assault, a U.S. F-117A radar-evading fighter crashed near Budjenovci, 35 miles northwest of the Yugoslav capital, Belgrade.

Yugoslav television broadcast footage showing flames rising from a tangled wreck that bore U.S. Air Force markings and the words "Air Combat Command."

Pentagon spokesman Ken Bacon said late Saturday the unidentified pilot had been rescued and was safe at an "allied air force base." He said the cause of the crash wasn't known and refused to provide details of the rescue.

The official Yugoslav news agency Tanjug said the $45 million fighter was shot down.

The crash was the alliance's first loss in the four-day air campaign aimed at preventing Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic from carrying out attacks on ethnic Albanians in the separatist Kosovo province.

Earlier Saturday, air raid alarms sounded across Yugoslavia on the fourth straight day of attacks, and Belgrade's air raid alert center said enemy planes were in the skies and had struck military targets in the suburbs of Rakovica and Zemun. It appealed for calm, saying only military sites were being targeted.

Skies cleared after more than a day of heavy rain over Aviano near the Italian Alps, and by dusk Saturday fighter jets were screaming off the runway every few seconds. Tomahawk missiles also were fired from U.S. ships.

President Clinton and British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Saturday repeated their insistence that NATO had to act to prevent Yugoslav security forces from slaughtering ethnic Albanians in Kosovo or driving them from their homes.

After meeting with his foreign policy team, Clinton spoke with the leaders of key NATO allies Italy, Germany, Britain and France and agreed to proceed with the next phase of airstrikes.

"All the leaders agreed that...It was time to broaden or deepen the attack," said National Security Council spokesman David Leavy.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION FOR SENIORS
• COMMENCEMENT PROGRAM LISTINGS•

The names that will be listed in the undergraduate Commencement Program book will be based on seniors of record/Class of 1999 as of April 9, 1999.

Because of proofing and printing deadlines, names can not be added to the program after that date. Please note, however, that if you are eligible to graduate, your graduation status is not effected even if your name is not listed.

IIMMEDIATELY contact a member of the "Senior Staff", Undergraduate Registrar's office (207 Whitmore, 5-0555) if:

#1 - you are unsure of your eligibility, have not declared a major, and/or anticipate changing your date of graduation;

#2 - there was an error in the February mailing from the Registrar's Office concerning your diploma name and/or graduation date, and you have not corrected it;

#3 - you did not receive the mailing and are expected to have all degree requirements completed by May 23, or by September 1.

The Undergraduate Commencement information brochure was mailed at the end of February. If you did not recieve it, copies are available at the Registrar's Ofiice and the Visitors Center.

■ Chhim

John Schrijn, from the firearms identification unit of the Massachusetts State Police, also testified. He submitted the bullet and bullet shell found at the scene of the shooting and identified the type of gun used to shoot Bishop. The weapon itself has not been found.

UMass freshman Bradley Horenstein, who lived in the same Cashin Residence Hall suite as Bishop, was the final witness to testify Friday. He said that he saw two suspicious-looking individuals standing near the door to his suite at approximately 7 p.m. the night of the shooting. They followed him into the suite, walked down the hall to Bishop's room, and knocked on his door. Horenstein then left the suite and did not return until after the shooting.

He submitted a typed statement to the police shortly after the shooting describing the men he saw in the hallway, and during Friday's trial, he identified Chhim as one of them. However, he originally described Chhim as Hispanic, and later said his eyes were more slanted, possibly "Oriental" — a point which Franco challenged.

"You're Hispanic yourself," Franco said. "Obviously you have met and been with a number of Hispanic people, and know what distinguishing features Hispanic people have... Slanted eyes are not characteristics of a Hispanic person."

The trial continues today in Hampshire County Superior Court in Northampton. Franco announced Friday that Chhim has an alibi — he was with a friend en route to a party in Revere. UMass student Jillian Swartz, who has identified Chhim as being in Bishop's room the afternoon of the shooting, is scheduled to be the next witness.

The major issues that they ran on included, revamping the judicial system so students can have representation at hearings. Privacy in the dorms is another issue that Howe and Avakian said they will fight for.

In light of the admissions policy change they say they are committed to getting enrollment up to 20 percent for Asian Latino African Native American (ALANA) students. "One issue is that the administration keeps saying there hasn't been a policy change, just the practice has changed, that is double talk," Avakian said. Avakian also discussed how he felt about the current President, Salwa Shamapande's endorsement of other candidates. "The fact that our ticket wasn't openly supported by the ALANA community has no affect on our platform or how strong we will fight for the issue."

Howe said they are already looking into ways to get the ball rolling on the admissions process. "We want to meet with the Chancellor and deans so when Avakian becomes trustee we will have a preliminary plan for a new admission policy that guarantees a 20 percent ALANA population at UMass."

Other things the administration plans to fight for are ATM's in Southwest and more in the Campus Center. They also plan on looking into getting athletes who play a varsity sport credit for doing so.

From all their years in the senate both Howe and Avakian understand the importance of open communication lines. The trustee's job is to meet with the Board of Trustees and to then get the information to the students on the UMass campus. As for the presidency, Howe says he will not fall into the traps previous presidents have in the past. "Past presidents have been passive in pursuing legislation, that is not going happen," Howe said.

The MASSPIRG referendum which was also on the ballot, passed by an overwhelming amount. This means students can still support MASSPIRG through a waivable fee that is put on the tuition bills. The election results for area governors will be available by the end of the week.

PITTSBURGH (AP) — A new computer virus can allow documents to be e-mailed to other people without warning, a potential security breach that should worry businesses and governments, an expert at Carnegie Mellon University said Saturday.

The "Melissa macro" or W97M-Melissa virus spreads via infected e-mail and attacks computers loaded with Microsoft's widely used Word 97 or Word 2000 programs, according to the Computer Emergency Response Team (CERT), Carnegie Mellon's Department of Defense-funded computer security team.

CERT first heard of the virus Friday afternoon and its members worked through the night to analyze the virus and develop a fix, CERT manager Katherine Fithen said.

"We're getting so many reports from across the world, that we know this is going to be a huge problem come Monday," Fithen said. She noted that since CERT was founded 10 years ago, this is only the second time it has considered a virus important enough to warrant a public announcement. The first, in 1994, warned of a virus that allowed computer burglars to collect passwords. CERT has not determined where the Melissa virus originated. Fithen said she is not allowed to say whether any governmental agency has suffered a security breach as the result of Melissa. Microsoft spokesman Adam Sohn said company programmers worked with CERT and manufacturers of anti-virus programs to develop an antidote.

If a computer user opens an infected Word-format document, the virus propagates itself by reading the user's e-mail address book and sending an infected message to the first 50 entries, CERT said. The message can include the contents of any Word document that is open on the computer, Fithen said.

Also, the virus reproduces and sends so much unwanted e-mail that the volume can overload some mail servers, the computers that distribute e-mail.

However, it apparently causes no direct damage to a computer's memory or programs.

Infected documents are sent as attachments to e-mails most frequently bearing a header: "Subject: Important Message From" the name of person whose computer relayed the virus.

The body of the message says "Here is that document you asked for... don't show it to anyone else ;-)."

KATMANDU, Nepal (AP) — A 15-year-old Nepali left for the Mt. Everest region Saturday, hoping to become the youngest person to scale the world's highest mountain.

Arvin Timilsina, a ninth-grade student from the western town of Pokhara, flew to Lukla, a dirt airstrip one week's trek from the Everest base camp, with three Sherpa guides and a cargo of climbing gear and supplies.

Timilsina and his team plan to reach the base camp at 17,500 feet next weekend and pitch their camp at the foot of the 29,028-foot mountain. For the next two months, the climbers will gradually set higher altitude camps to prepare for a mid-May final assault.

"I am confident of my success as long as I don't get nervous once I get to the mountain," Timilsina told the Associated Press before boarding a small twin-engine plane.

Timilsina is eyeing a record set by Shambu Tamang in 1973 when he climbed Everest at the age of 17 to become the youngest conqueror of Everest.

"When I was 10 years old, I heard about the successful climb of Everest by a Nepali woman. Since then, I have never stopped dreaming about the day I set foot on the summit of Everest," he said.

His expedition is being sponsored by businessmen from Pokhara, his school and his family.

Since Everest was first conquered by New Zealander Sir Edmund Hillary and Sherpa Tenzing Norgay, about 800 people have scaled the mountain. Authorities say 180 climbers have died on its unpredictable slopes.

The blood business

Chris Bradshaw

We live in a nation where the saying "it's a dog eat dog world" is not just a tool to help parents explain to their child why they were cut from the team. It is a proverb that has come to define us as a country. No successful institution is free from the frequently dirty hands of politics or from employing cut-throat business tactics of some breed.

Why all the criticism of Elizabeth Hanford Dole, wife of former senator and presidential candidate Bob Dole, and her tireless work as head of the American Red Cross? Remember, we are speaking of a nation where the sight of an over-grown pit-bull swallowing a powerless Chihuahua might be accepted as the state of the country. Why, then, could scattered snorts of disgust be heard from the Silicon Valley to the port of Maine when extensive stories ran in the commercial and not-so-commercial press on Dole's work to streamline this country's most beloved charitable organization?

What about the fact that the Red Cross was funded, in part, by donations from huge corporations? Why did so many roll their eyes and throw their arms in the air at the fact that these corporations have been major supporters of Bob Dole in his many campaigns, including his run for presidency in '96? People surely weren't surprised by the fact that the "advisors" who helped Dole run the charitable group were aides of Mrs. Dole and her husband throughout their political careers and were hired to shape policy at the Red Cross, were they?

In this age of corporate power, we may have accepted the fact that politics has seeped into the administrative bodies of every widely successful organization, charitable or not, and vice-versa. However, most are far from happy with the situation. The never-ending search for ways to cut costs or expand by the elite continues to translate into layoffs for the rest of us and people bitterly accept it.

But come on now... the Red Cross?! Aren't we talking about those smiling faces that dab your arm with a cotton swab and thank you for your donation? Yes we are and the organization has and continues to do good all over the globe. However, since 1991, the year she began her reign as its president, when we refer to business policy at the Red Cross, we must also refer to the one person most responsible for shaping all policy at the organization. She is a crafty would-be presidential candidate in the year 2000 whose childhood friends affectionately called her "Libby."

Dole sought, in her eight years as its President, to breed the Red Cross into the pit-bull of charitable groups and give herself a political boost in the process. No wonder she hasn't had too difficult of a time shedding her sweet childhood nickname. What about all the Chihuahua in the blood business?

Workers at the Red Cross are said to have perceived Dole's political past and potential future as changing the working atmosphere there for the worst. Once an organization where the respect given to the ideas of scores of volunteers created a lively and interactive working environment, the governing body under Dole has consisted of herself and a few political cronies. They didn't want anyone else's input, according to a feature story that ran in a 1996 issue of The Nation by Linda Heller. Politics as usual? Business as usual? You bet.

The Red Cross provides housing and food to victims of some 68,000 disasters every year, and social services like informing people of the risks of unsafe sex. It is also responsible for collecting 49 percent of donated blood in the U.S. When Dole signed on as president she made a commitment to keep that percentage on the up and up without doing anything politically damaging to herself. This meant the organization had to get the bids to draw blood from big employers and agencies and be relatively quiet about how it went about that.

The numbers should make it obvious as to the real nature of how the Red Cross does business. It is hugely successful — thanks to Dole's work in the past decade — hugely influential, and just downright huge. If an organization, whose self-proclaimed business is social service, has been able to become huge in an economic environment with so much competition, I for one, smell some recently ingested Chihuahua.

Heller's 1996 feature ran in the heat of the election campaigns. The piece was titled "Blood on the Campaign Trail, Elizabeth Dole, Presidential politics, and the Christian Right." It notes some specific instances where Mr. and Mrs. Dole's political and spiritual ties to Christian political groups and their own "private political agenda" resulted in changes in Red Cross public health policy. Heller gives the example of the publication of an AIDS manual being halted by Mrs. Dole due to pressure from Christian groups on both her and her husband. The manual was then reviewed with an eye for toning down "language and illustrations" and placing more of an emphasis on "individual responsibility."

According to Heller's feature, members of the organization's public service department, dedicated to unbiased and candid medical advising, weren't too happy about the changes Dole made to the manual and said they were politically and religiously motivated.

In an article that appeared in The Boston Globe on Feb. 3 by Aaron Zitner, Dole's Red Cross is accused by doctors in independent blood banks of aggressive business dealings that hardly coincide with its humanitarian image. Dole has turned blood banking into a cutthroat business. Independents throughout the nation are forced to compete with the nearly Fortune 500 Red Cross for the right to draw blood at the largest employers in their area, according to Zitner's story.

According to Zitner's article, there were other factors like the requirements that began in the '80s for expensive AIDS and Hepatitis testing. Hospitals looking to pay less for blood put the independents at a disadvantage. None of those factors were the overgrown, politically minded and corporate funded pit-bull that would ultimately do the chomping.

It's a dog eat dog world out there, even in the blood business.

Letters to the Editor

Chancellor's view on new policy

To the University community:

All of us in the University administration know that many students feel hurt, angry, and betrayed over our changing admissions practices. We deeply regret this and wish that things could be different. Please consider this letter a sincere attempt to develop a constructive dialog with the student community.

We are in great sympathy with the desire some students have expressed to call a moratorium on the changes. Unfortunately, this is not possible. However, we continue to use race as one factor in admissions in concert with the principles of the 1978 Bakke decision. I assure you that I and every member of my administration are personally committed to achieving our goal of recruiting and graduating students who reflect the diversity of the Commonwealth's high school seniors.

I thought it would be of interest to you to know what we're doing currently in pursuit of this goal:

Putting students first: We have learned many things over the past few weeks: for one, this campus must become more student-centered, starting with the admissions process and lasting until graduation. In a few weeks we will announce reorganization of Student Affairs and other aspects of my administration with this issue in mind.

Admissions Task Force: We support the proposal from the Afro-American studies department and the Social Justice faculty in the School of Education to appoint a task force to study a number of issues related to long-term actions. The Task Force will be charged with examining all issues of admissions and developing concrete steps for us to take. We shall put the Task Force in place by the first week of April, and we are asking student governance groups to submit names of students who would be willing to work during the summer on this Task Force with appropriate support.

Retention Task Force: The University's Retention Committee's subcommittee on ALANA issues will be reappointed to recommend an action plan for improving the retention of students of color. I will ask the subcommittee to hold at least one public hearing before the end of the semester to receive input from students. This subcommittee will also work through the summer, and we will ask student governance to assist on these issues as well. It is my hope that some recommendations will be made in time to be implemented by next fall.

In addition to these efforts, we will work hard this spring to convince already admitted students to enroll. Any student who would like to assist in this effort should call Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos at 545-2300 or email him at cevallos@spanport.umass.edu. Also, current students and faculty are calling potential students in a series of phone-a-thons. To sign up, call Jerry Quarles in Student Affairs at 545-2300.

Long-term outreach: We will soon propose a massive, state-wide effort to identify and work with middle school students of color and those from low income families to assist in their preparation for college. This proposal will call for a partnership among all 29 public higher education campuses, businesses, families, K-12 schools, and state government.

I have stated my belief many times that students from higher income backgrounds have an advantage in any admissions process based on test scores, since lower incomes will, in general, translate into poorer support in schools, neighborhoods and the home. It is clear that the entire system should be retooled. We will work hard to find new models here at UMass which are inherently fairer and which also acknowledge the human creativity and potential not always demonstrated by test scores.

All of us in the administration believe, with your support and help, we can emerge as a stronger more unified University. We know from experience that often the best new ideas come from students. We hope that you'll contribute your ideas as we work together in the future.

Chancellor David K. Scott

A note of thanks

Dear UMass Students,

We would like to take this opportunity to thank you for allowing us the privilege of representing you in the upcoming year. We also must thank those that made all of this possible: namely our incredible campaign staff and friends who kept us going for the last week. The Collegian, WMUA and UVC-19 were all excellent and served this campus well in spreading ideas and helping to inform the student body.

One of the unfortunate aspects of campaigning is the overzealous postering of our campus. It is the responsibility of the candidates to get their message across to the students and get them out to vote, and we are proud to say that there was an unprecedented turnout this year. However, now it is the responsibility of the candidates to take down these posters. We ask for your help in tearing down and recycling these signs.

We feel strongly about the issues we campaigned on. We vow to the students to take action, so that at this time next year you will have results rather than a year of empty promises. All of the issues on our platform can be dealt with, and we take the responsibility to see that they are accomplished with results that benefit students. In the next few weeks we will show how dedicated we are to achieving our objectives — we expect to work on all of our campaign issues and have some of those goals completed before the summer.

You have given us an incredible opportunity and a tremendous responsibility. We will not let you down. Your expectations of the SGA need to be higher than in the past. Our experience and determination will allow us to leave UMass a better place. From this day on, every student must remember one thing: the SGA is back in business. Thank you.

Okay, we get the point already: be careful with the things we buy. Now leave us alone!

In case you haven't noticed, or are completely oblivious to the world around you, major corporations are punishing the common folk of the planet with "Warnings" and "Cautions." Absolutely ridiculous instructions and pointers are now posted by companies on any product you might want to buy — a retaliation for being sued by the mental invalids out there who actually did those ridiculous things with these products before there was a warning posted.

You know what I'm talking about. McDonald's put all sorts of red flags on their coffee containers after some nitwit was stupid enough to pour the scalding hot liquid on herself. Note to nitwit: coffee is hot — this isn't a reality that McDonald's created, it's always been that way.

Here are some other examples...

On my high school math teacher's wife's curling iron, the fine print said: Warning — Do not use this item while sleeping.

I've heard of sleepwalking and sleeptalking, but the idea of sleeping while using a curling iron is a bit silly. Apparently, however, this is a real problem in the world: women are waking up completely bewildered because their hair is mysteriously curled. Perhaps if these women read that helpful warning while they were asleep, they'd know to stop at doing their nails and go back to bed. God knows what kind of a make-over somebody might wake up with if they're not careful. At least there's one company who's looking out for us all.

Next time you buy a travel mug with a warranty card, read the fine print: Caution — Do not use travel mug while driving.

I'm not making this up, kids. Pardon me for asking, but isn't that the reason "travel" mugs were invented? So they're okay for other kinds of travel, like, say, bike-riding and marathon-running — during which people are obviously going to want plenty of insulated fluids that can in no way be contained by things like sports bottles. Cars, I guess, are completely out of the question. When driving, use a paper cup to carry your coffee. Just avoid taking the vehicle out of "park" and you should be fine.

Seth Koenig

"Let me get this straight. We're not supposed to drop it? I was wondering why it kept screwing up after I played basketball with it."

On my last minicassette recorder, there was this cute little reminder: Dropping this item may cause the item to work incorrectly.

Let me get this straight. We're not supposed to drop it? I was wondering why it kept screwing up after I played basketball with it. So, pray tell, what exactly are we supposed to do with it then, not drop it? Record stuff? That's a foolish idea!

Also in the user's manual, this was added: Do not attempt to clean the Recorder with toxic chemicals or detergents.

Sure. Put away the battery acid, junior. I know you want a clean minicassette recorder as much as the next guy, but you'll just have to use something less abrasive, like water. Take the lethal industrial strength cleaner to the kitchen instead, seeing as how we all regularly use toxic chemicals or detergents in everyday use.

It really doesn't matter what it is you're using. Like the telephone, for instance. This common item is used so often that it seems funny to think that there would be any real danger in it, aside from some utter moron strangling themselves with the chord — all you utter morons need to be careful, now. The phone in my bedroom had an interesting little warning pertaining to the "memory function" that said: In the case of emergencies, Lexxon (the company that made the appliance) is not responsible for the user's reliance on the memory function.

Simply put, even though I spent "X" amount of money on this telephone, I am not allowed to assume it works. Yeah, I'll feel pretty secure about being able to ring up my buddies by the mere touch of a button — dialing seven numbers is a major problem when crucial seconds are ticking away that I could be using to gab with friends — but when I'm bleeding profusely from the esophagus or something, I should have to look up all sorts of phone numbers buried deep in the yellow pages. Memory function? Fiddlesticks!

Oh, here's one more for the road: Warning — Collegian columnists are not responsible for mental trauma resulting from the reading of the column. I mean that.

Seth Koenig is a Collegian columnist.

Belizaire speaks out on issues
Movement to spread nationally

By Edgar A. Barros
Collegian Staff

There have been many questions surrounding the recent movement on campus regarding the administration's decision to change its admissions process with regards to race. The movement, which is being referred to as the "Task Force for Equal Opportunity and Access for All People," is led by a group of graduate and undergraduate students.

The movement has gained tremendous media attention from the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, and other local media. National attention though has been nearly non-existent.

"The lack of national media attention is attested to the fact that we haven't gotten the word to them effectively. In April that will all change. We have compiled a list of all major media sources across the nation. We do have plans to send press releases to all major media sources everyday. We have also made allies with campuses throughout the New England area," said Jeff Belizaire, an undergraduate student, President of the Black Student Union, and a member of the Task Force's steering committee.

There have been several peaceful demonstrations on campus this past month. Belizaire feels that they have been very effective, particularly in three specific areas.

"They have been very effective. It has achieved three things. One, it allowed us to make a political statement. Two, it galvanized the five-college area, and three, it brought exposure to the movement. Now it is time to take it to the next level. Now we have to apply pressure to President (William) Bulger and the Trustees."

"Pull Quote: "The movement will not be contained within the Pioneer Valley. We will make this a national political agenda, thus attracting political resources from around the nation."

The possibility of a building takeover, similar to the Goodell Takeover of 1996 is of growing concern.

"On the question of whether or not we will implement a building takeover is not something I want to comment on. I plead the fifth," Belizaire said.

The disagreement between the students and the administration over whether or not the change in admission practice is just or unjust, continues to be the main gap.

"Our demand is not just to put the old policy back in place. It is to put the old policy back in place for a certain period of time, so as to allow it to be studied and modified by an independent commission comprised of students, faculty and staff," Belizaire said.

The administration has made it clear, through a letter from the chancellor and several campus-wide e-mails, that race has not been eliminated from the admissions practice, it is now "one of the many factors." Belizaire does not agree with this change and continues to push that the old practice be put back into place.

"It is like adding water to ketchup — it waters it down. By making race one of the many factors, it doesn't get the full justification. Whereas if it was a major factor, it would result in a more efficient race-conscious decision," Belizaire said.

Belizaire feels that the meeting last Friday with Bob Karam, chairman of the Board of Trustees, and Chancellor David K. Scott, was not productive, and he doesn't feel that the administration is trying to work with the Task Force.

"How could they be ready and willing to work with us if they are totally oblivious to what being a person of color in America is all about? In other words, what would the oppressor know about what it is like to be oppressed," Belizaire said.

"This is why we are demanding a moratorium on the current admission practice and set up a commission of students, faculty, and staff, from people of all backgrounds, who will research and discuss the possibility of a new admission policy which is fair to all and is legal," he said.

The Task Force has concentrated all its efforts in the Pioneer Valley up to this point. Belizaire sees the movement becoming bigger and broader.

"The movement will not be contained within the Pioneer Valley. We will make this a national political agenda, thus attracting political resources from around the nation."

According to Belizaire, more effective plans are in the works.

"We plan to hit the University where it hurts. We have a big surprise for the administration."

Belizaire feels that the Task Force has made a genuine effort in trying to work with the University, and they continue to do so.

"We have made it point to work with the University. All of our demonstrations have been peaceful and respectful, we are not trying to intimidate anyone. We simply want to work with the president, the chancellor, and the Board of Trustees in finding an admission policy that is both legal and fair to all people."

Roxbury unites for community

Rosaline Valcimond

For over a decade the Cape Verdean Community House has been rotting away on Dudley St. in Roxbury. The historical building, which has been used for the various needs of the area residents, after years of vacancy will become the Vine Street Community Center.

Planning for the community center has been in the works since 1992. But for once it was not the city holding up the project but the area's multicultural residents. While the city was willing to give money to renovate, the various cultural groups were bickering over who should have control of the renovation project.

In a neighborhood that is too often left for ruins, where under-funding projects is a common occurrence, the residents of Roxbury could not afford to be divided. For all the problems in this multicultural working class neighborhood working together should not be one of them. Roxbury and its residents will benefit more from a community center that represents the entire community and not just one particular cultural group. After a series of meetings, the community reached a mutual agreement on how the center would best serve the needs of the community.

The newly named Vine Street Community Center will have space for a pre-school/day care center for children and a senior center, which will include a lunch program. There will be space for a large classroom, arts and crafts room, computer room, fitness room, and a gymnasium as well. The cost of construction, equipment, and furnishing will total $3.9 million. The construction will be completed in April 2000.

"After a series of meetings, the community reached a mutual agreement on how the center would best serve the needs of the community."

The mayor was present at the ground breaking as a sign of his commitment to improve Roxbury. As construction continues, life goes on in this bustling area. But residents know that there are positive initiatives underway to help revitalizing the area that would not have happened without their willingness to find a common ground.

Let this be a lesson to the community on working together. If the community can unite more often who knows how well they can improve and empower the neighborhood. The Vine Street Community Center can be the first step towards joining the residents for the sake of building a better community.

One time for the mind

Emron William

Fusion of the mind.

Walk through the streets of Brooklyn.

You are underneath the train's tracks, ready to cross the street. Before you proceed, an old man with stonewashed jeans from 1989, asks you if you want to buy a pair of hand-me-down shades.

Really you know it's not for him. It's for his boy's crack habit. But he gets 10 percent for each piece of revenue he brings in. You also realize the old man is no different from the others trying to make those quarters to feed his family of five, although the last baby isn't his.

I shake my pockets, and find a couple of dimes, nickels and quarters.

I don't have my hand quite out of my pocket before I hear a man saying, "Pss, Pss, Chocolate Queen come here guuuurrlll!!"

Finally giving the man some change, I cross the street looking to find a store where I can purchase a Malta Goya.

But before I find one I notice the grocery truck that has a big sale on everything.

As I go to buy two cases of Malta for two dollars, I notice that behind the salesman, Tommy Hillfiger sweaters are for sale for only $20.

Walking towards my aunt's house, pass the trash on the ground, I say to myself, thank goodness I have my education.

As if someone besides myself was listening to my thoughts, it says to me, "Just who do you think you are?"

"Don't forget where you came from. You may have had your education from an institution that did not always exemplify your culture. But every time you came home for visits you did not have to question your identity. All you had to do was turn the corner, and see Tita, Sasha and the rest playing hair salon. With Tita telling Sasha not to use too much Dax because her hair texture is different.

Or remember when you would hear Rodney and the rest of them, making beats using Cool and the Gang's, "Get Down On It."

"My education gives me no right to make my self an outsider to a community that always claimed me."

Allana E. Todman

You would freestyle rhyme with the rest of them, making beats using Cool and the Gang's, "Get Down On It."

This conversation from my invisible friend opened my eyes once again to take a humble stance on my education. Realizing that I am no different from my sisters and brothers who live in the city. My education gives me no right to make myself an outsider to a community that always claimed me.

However my education gives me the right to use my knowledge to create a network for my people. If this type of network existed on many different mediums there would be no need for the term we call, "affirmative action."

Affirmative action in this day and age is needed for the inabilities for our nation to rid itself of institutionalized racism. In the city schools the retention rate, when compared to those students who attend suburban schools, is at a low percent.

Ironically the thousands of middle class employees in the workforce, commute into the cities, only to leave them and return to their quiet communities. With no linkage to the problems that the surrounding communities in the city deal with. A gap remains.

This gap will only decrease if people who link to the urban communities of Boston and New York City contribute to it. Whether through economics or mentorship, it is our opportunity to give back.

So as you open your microfridge to heat up the rice and curry chicken that your Mom made for you when you went home, take a minute to remember just where you came from.

Clinton's education proposals

Lanell E. James

On March 23, Civil Rights leaders discussed President Clinton's education proposals. Under the President's proposal, a child passing or graduating depends heavily upon strenuous testing. Additionally, Clinton's proposal stresses the end to social promotion. However, minority children that attend public schools that are impoverished, under-funded, and lack academic resources could suffer when new efforts hold students accountable for their performance. According to Hugh B. Price, the President of the National Urban League, "President Clinton's proposals, which include tying a child's promotion or graduation to rigorous testing, should include plans to fix city schools and provide better teachers there."

So, in response, the Civil Rights organization, has put forth the Academic Bill of Rights. This bill demands that school districts prove that they are providing minority students with an equal education before using the test-based promotion plans. As Hugh B. Price indicates, "Accountability begins with quality. Few urban districts can claim that the key ingredients are available to all students, especially low-income minority pupils."

For many, this bill is long over-due, considering that for some time it has been an uphill battle for public schools to have the basics: qualified teachers, academically equipped classrooms, new books, up-to-date courses, and money in general. Having these tools, would drastically improve test scores, enrich the childrens' learning experience, and most importantly prepare them for college.

Despite the benefits of the bill, some states such as Texas and Ohio are in opposition to it. They are not supportive of a bill that requires proof of the quality of education, before testing minority children. They claim that the Academic Bill of Rights excludes minority children from testing, and that all children should be held to the same standards.

However, many argue — how can a school test its students without being certain that they have provided all of the essential resources for a proper education, including the acquisition of information? As Memphis City Schools Superintendent Gertry House states, "We must not literally or figuratively fail our children because it's easier than recognizing our own failures."

In essence, the Academic Bill of Rights allows minority children and their families to require school districts to take responsibility for their students education. If the courses, books, teachers, and classrooms are inadequate and inhibit a child from learning and being able to manipulate information, than there is a problem that needs to be addressed. The Academic Bill of Rights starts that dialogue, and gives power to the families and their children; the ones who the schools are supposed to be serving.

Best said by Manning Marable, "The 1990s are different from the '50s and '60s. The new segregation of the '90s is between the educated haves and the uneducated have-nots."

Recognizing that this statement is true, and truly understanding and realizing how important education is, are two different things. The Academic Bill of Rights and its supporters realize the role of education, and that is why it was created. We want black people to be the haves and not the have-nots.....

Remnants of slavery affect all present-day movements

Emron William

In a recent analysis of the Atlantic slave trade, writer and historian, C.L.R. James reminds us that "every people, every race, has passed through a stage of slavery." Furthermore, he says that, "it would be not only inextricably confusing, but impossible to attempt any summary of the infinite varieties of slavery in past ages." Although every piece of historical evidence, or more specifically, cultural imperialism has direct modern influences, Euro-African slavery, had global repercussions that are still shaping society today.

In an economic analysis, C.L.R. James draws significance to a relation made by 19th century economist, Karl Marx, who accredits slavery as a precedence for the industrial revolution. Marx says, "Modern nations have been able only to disguise slavery in their own countries." In reference to workers who mass produce in factories, we can imply that wage labor is a step up from slavery, or the methodology behind slavery was not abolished, rather servitude is now matched with controlled wages. The mobility of the working class, or wage laborer come into question. Are union workers entitled to the vast economic possibilities of the "Ragged Dick" philosophy behind capitalism and full enterprise, or are they just 20th century "indentured servants" praying for equal opportunity?

In her book titled Race in North America, Audrey Smedley summarizes the revolt against Irish slavery under the English, "It was Bacon's rebellion in 1676 that prompted wealthy planters to realize the dangers posed by the dissatisfied laborer." Smedley goes on to say that "Enslaved Indians had communities of support among their own people, and the threat of Indian attacks to recapture their own tribespeople was constant." Furthermore, she says, "The Irish were a rebellious lot, their comparatively high linguistic and cultural homogeneity allowed them to plot mutinies and insurrections, in several of which they were successful." As more and more colonies began to distegrate, the British sought a more permanent form of slavery. As products of the Atlantic slave trade, Africans were apparently singled out in efforts by the British to form a lasting economic system. Like tourists, their unfamiliarity with the new world subdued any germs of rebellion.

Smedley summarizes an economic rationale behind the maintenance of the Atlantic slave trade. She says, "The advantages of African labor over that of either the Indians or the Irish were made obvious to English plantation owners by the late 17th century, as they had been earlier to the Spanish and Portuguese. The supply of African slaves increased to meet a growing demand for labor, and the cost to the planters of purchasing a slave for life soon fell below the cost of a European servant." After 1640, sugar plantations in the West Indies required labor in masses. By 1670, Virginia relied on its laborers from the slave trade. The economic dependence on the Atlantic slave trade grew alongside the negro perception as an everlasting "commodity" primarily for economic maintenance.

With the permanence of the Atlantic slave trade in 1661 grew the image of the African. Their attributes; immunities to old diseases, knowledge of tropical cultivation, and overall agricultural capabilities were not respected as civilized, rather they were seen as advantages towards enslavement. With the many justifications for slavery offered by English colonists, the black skin of Africans was also associated with inferiority.

In his book, "White Over Black," historian Winthrop Jordan explains the English encounter as "markedly different from that of the Spanish and Portuguese who for centuries had been in close contact with North Africa and had actually been invaded and subjected by people both darker and more highly civilized than themselves." Audrey Smedley describes historical evidence of English contact with Africans before the institution of slavery in North America. John Hawkins organized three raids into Africa for slaves, along with John Cabot and Sir Francis drake. Hawkins also pirated Spanish ships carrying slaves. Smedley says that, "Such slaving activities must have encouraged a callous indifference to the slaves as human beings and increased the perception of Africans as mere cargo, like cattle, horses, or pigs."

The disenfranchised African slave was believed to be destined to serve for his own fortune, but why? Was it slavery that manifested his destiny, or was his destiny manifested by slavery? In the late 1950's, historian, Carl Degler argued that "Discrimination of the negro preceded the evolution of a slave status and by that fact helped to shape the form that institution would assume." Winthrop Jordan suggests that the very blackness of Africans was on first contact striking enough to ensure the development of a bias toward them. Beginning with pigment, there were negative connotations behind the word "black" and "blackness" altogether with positive connections with the word "white." Such linguistic implications existed before a racial institution, but how literally, "white" Europeans were and how literally "black" Africans were can force us further back in history to where these words derived their association with humankind.

Slavery as an antecedent of racism, racism as an antecedent of slavery has become the subject of popular 20th century analysis. Alexis De Toqueville says, "Slavery has given birth to what he saw as 'immovable' prejudice against the negro." Winthrop Jordan says, "rather than slavery causing 'prejudice' or vice versa; they seem to have generated each other. Both were...twin aspects of a general debasement of the negro." Equally cause and effect, slavery and racism seemingly reacted upon each other.

In North America, the slave trade was outlawed in 1807; the end of all involuntary servitude. Its remnants are left for speculation. As for African culture in North America, every movement, whether progressive or regressive evolves from an identity as slaves.

Guild unleashes deadly plants, laughs in Horrors

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

LITTLE SHOP OF HORRORS
Student Union Ballroom
March 27

Sadistic dentists, clumsy shop workers, dumb blondes and bloodthirsty giant plants can only be the invention of a very black comedy, and there is perhaps no better black comedy musical than Little Shop of Horrors. The UMass Theatre Guild certainly proved that argument this past weekend; their Little Shop was marked by perfect comic timing, virtually flawless acting and singing and a number of show- stopping performances.

In fact, if there were any striking faults in the production, they lay within the play itself. Little Shop has a rousing, hilarious first act, but the second half quickly becomes much darker, more serious, and therefore, less funny. It's a credit to the cast and crew, then, that their energy was enough to sustain the inherent flaws.

The tone for Little Shop of Horrors is set in the very beginning — anything goes. From the very first musical number to the bizarre finale, the play has its tongue firmly placed in its cheek, blending satire, pop-culture references and ironically, witty humor.

Seymour (Harry LaCoste) is a dorky, poor shop owner who yearns for nothing more than to make it out of "Skid Row" and to win over Audrey (Marcey Secora), a slinky, ditzy blonde who's strung along by motorcycle-riding, pain- loving dentist (Gordon Bedford). Seymour, by way of a mysterious plant, gets much more than this though, and everyone pays the price. Along the way, the action is unfolded with Motown verve by a "Greek chorus" of three soul sisters, Chiffon (Nicole Gageras), Crystal (Kim Shaker), and Ronnette (Heidi Crawley).

All of this is fodder for talent showcasing, and the cast of Little Shop has talent to spare. LaCoste carried the show in a hugely difficult part — Seymour must be dorky without being pitiful, sincere without being too saccharine, gullible without being idiotic. LaCoste managed to walk that line perfectly — in fact, his acting was almost invisible at times, as seamless as the costumes (no pun intended) or the characters themselves. LaCoste was also a strong singer, hitting his highest point in the wonderful "Skid Row" number.

Bedford, meanwhile, stole every scene he was in. The character of the sadistic Orin the dentist, the "Leader of the Plaque" as he calls himself, is automatically funny, but it takes a real comic timing to fully bring everything to the role. Bedford was appropriately outlandish and has a way of moving on–stage that says more than the words themselves.

Evan Kelly as shop owner Mushnik and the three do–wop singers (Gageras, Shaker, and Crawley) were also very strong, especially in their singing. Marcey Secora, as Audrey, was effective in perhaps the most difficult role in the play. While her acting and singing were only adequate at times, she did a beautiful rendition of "Somewhere That's Green" and had a few choice moments of comic fun.

All in all, the cast was spectacular from the starring roles down to the small ones. There are bit players, and then there is Brian Girard. He added some much needed pure humor to The Wiz, and now, with Little Shop, he has simply become a full–fledged star. Girard had a couple of roles in the show, and brought something different to each one the; like Bedford, he did more with movement and facial expressions than voice–work. The combination of Bedford and Girard, then, in a scene between the dentist and Girard's masochistic patient, was worth the price of admission alone.

Director Kelly Ristaino, in her college directorial debut, can be safely assured that she has a very, very long career ahead of herself. She has a superb visual sense and flair for timing, and the show moved effortlessly between scenes thanks to her movement and the choreography of Kristin Stewart. The first act in particular flowed remarkably well, especially in the scenes when the plant first arrives, in the "Skid Row" scene, and the dentist's scenes.

Of course, one of the key's to the whole show is the plant, and the Guild's plant was only passable. It was active enough, but didn't have enough personality. Perhaps this is the fault of the inconsistent voice work of Delores Brown or the operation and design of the plant, but luckily it didn't subtract from the show significantly.

Otherwise, the technical work was outstanding, especially the sound — credit to audio engineer Matt Pasternak and technical director Gareth Booker.

The Guild's production of Little Shop was also their most personal since Tommy — the stage was smaller, the audience closer and more engaged. But one wishes that they had a grander, more powerful arena than the Student Union Ballroom, but less grand than the soulless Fine Arts Center. Of course, like a lot of things here at UMass, that's the fault of the school, not its students, who consistently rise above expectations.

EBN's Breakdown assaults senses

TELECOMMUNICATION BREAKDOWN
TVT

The audio–video assault band that is EBN (Emergency Broadcast Network) lives in a world where the medium of television is worshipped like a deity. It is a world where entertainment has become a necessity and television will indoctrinate you to be a model citizen. It is EBN's mission to create the most perfect electronic behavior control system ever created. In other words, EBN is more in touch with reality than the rest of the world.

EBN has gained notoriety through their music and video performances. For those of you who caught D.J. Spooky last semester at Pearl Street, EBN supplied all the visuals and even showed a visual set of their own. EBN is a band that is just as important to be seen as well as heard. The Brookline Village based trio of Joshua Pearson, Gardner Post and Ron O'Donnell have seen clips from their songs used as promos for WBCN in Boston (George Bush doing vocals on Queen's "We Will Rock You"), and have provided entertainment in between sets at early Lollapalooza festivals.

EBN's musical staple is samples. 80–90 percent of the sound on their 1995 album, Telecommunication Breakdown, which was produced by Jack Dangers of Meat Beat Manifesto, is made up of samples—taken mostly from C- Span, CNN and other news broadcasts. The first track on the CD, "Electronic Behavior Control System" features the voices of Bill Clinton, Ross Perot, Anthony Robbins and William Shatner among many others. Voices of well known politicians and news reporters are commonplace in EBN's music. "Get Down Ver 2.2" features the unrecognizable chalkboard screech of Mariah Carey, and the voice of Harrison Ford screaming "Get down!" in a sound clip from Patriot Games sampled over a new beat to Kool & the Gang's "Jungle Boogie." Other tracks that are highly enjoyable include "Shoot the Mac–10," "Sexual Orientation," and "Homicidal Schizophrenic (A Lad Insane)," the latter taking its title from David Bowie's "Aladin Sane."

But, I must say again, EBN is a band that needs to be seen as well as heard. So, slam Telecommunication Breakdown into your computer and see the full length videos for "Electronic Behavior Control System," "Homicidal Schizophrenic" and "3:7:8." The CD even comes with a 3.5 inch floppy disk to load in if you have a Macintosh.

If you don't have a computer (or even if you do), check out EBN's VHS video, Commercial Entertainment Product.

Blank, Cusack hits all the marks

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

GROSSE POINTE BLANK
with John Cusack, Minnie Driver, Joan Cusack

Perhaps one of the most overlooked movies in recent memory, Grosse Pointe Blank, is a brilliantly written, seductive romantic comedy. The movie intersperses its frequent action scenes with mundane conversations producing a quirky and off beat humor unparalleled.

It's hard to imagine hit men interacting in everyday society, but that's exactly what the movie puts on display. The humanization of these supposed monsters makes the film not only extremely clever but also surprisingly touching. This is truly a dark comedy, the way they should be made.

Martin Blank, our hero, is a successful independent hit man seemingly searching for a way out. When an assignment coincides with his 10–year high school reunion, he must return to the small town of Grosse Pointe and face the girl whom he left on prom night 10 years earlier. What develops is an enormously engaging tale about escaping the past, circumventing the present, and hoping for the future. After all, even a hit man deserves a second shot.

And is it possible to think of a more lovable hit man than John Cusack? His natural deadpan and wide–eyed innocence make him the perfect person to embody such an emotional struggle. Even as an amoral assassin, he's extremely charming and funny — he really does have "a new–found respect for life." The audience just can't help but rooting for him. In fact, Cusack reaffirms everything that we've loved about him since the coming of age classic, Say Anything.

Not to be outdone, Dan Aykroyd plays Cusack's rival so light–heartedly that the result is absolutely hysterical. Basically, Aykroyd's character, Grocer, is trying to convince the reluctant Martin to join the hit man union that he's forming. Martin, perpetually refusing the numerous serenades, results in some wonderfully funny on–screen exchanges.

COURTESY FRANK MASI

John Cusack as a hit man in Grosse Pointe Blank.

The exchange of slick, witty repartee, and good old– fashioned insults is absolutely classic dialogue and classic Cusack.

Imagine two assassins with guns pointed at each other sitting in a small diner debating the finer semantics of an omelet.

Lastly, rumor has it that a sequel is in the works, once again with Cusack writing. There seems to be some debate though, because Minnie Driver's character is rumored to start the movie in a mental institution.

More dark comedy, I can't wait.

Fundamentals cost women's lacrosse game at the Carrier Dome to 'Cuse

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — What could be more nerve racking then playing a lacrosse game at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse, N.Y. in front of your hometown friends and family? Running into a hot goalie and not being able to accomplish all of the little things that make your team competitive against the better teams in the nation.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (3–2) failed to do those little things on Saturday afternoon in an 11–2 loss to the 'Cuse. For players like senior Melissa Anderson, and juniors Rebecca Passanese, Noelle Gorski and Sara MacNabb, the failure to give the Orangewomen more of a run for their money might loom in their minds for a long time to come.

The Minutewomen struggled to do the little things such as connecting on their passes, capitalizing on their scoring opportunities and finishing on their free positions during the course of the game. The lack of fundamentals kept them from giving playing No. 19 Syracuse tight the way they did a year ago in a 8–6 loss at Ruth J. Totman Field.

The Minutewomen did not only struggle to get scoring opportunities, but when they finally got them they ran into a brick wall, in the form of Syracuse netminder Clothilde Ewing who made 14 saves and held the Minutewomen scoreless for the last 36:14 of the game.

Melissa Anderson

"I'm very happy with the way I played, you know in the first couple of games we got scored on a lot, and it is tough when your giving up 15, 16 and 18 goals not in our favor, so it's great when we can do it to another team," Ewing said of her recent resurgence.

"We made her (Ewing) look great. We did a great job of making her look great," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said. "We had key players, not playing their sharpest. Nobody stepped it up, hoping that someone else will do the work."

Ewing was not alone in the crease. Her defense did a tremendous job of keeping UMass from getting easy shots on net. Even when the Minutewomen did a good job penetrating inside and earning a free position, the Orangewomen defenders did a great job of getting to the shooters before they could even get their shot off.

"Our defense played awesome. It's the best game that we have played in a year and half. They (Syracuse defenders) didn't let them even get inside the 8–meter zone, which is what we wanted to do," Ewing said of her defense. "On free positions, the defense buried them before they could even got a shot off, and wouldn't let them get the ball back."

The Minutewomen struggles went beyond the opposing goal. They went a meager 1–6 on free positions where they attempted to get off a shot, while Laura Koruz who didn't play in the game against Vermont went 0–3 on the free chances. Syracuse came through on their free opportunities, going 3–6 for the game. Two of those conversions coming early on starting goaltender Jen Nardi who gave up four goals on her first four shots. Nardi then picked up late when she later came in for Tara Durkin who had replaced her.

In terms of positives the MInutewomen did receive a goal from defender Melissa Miele. It was Miele's second goal of the season.

The Minutewomen will need to pick up their play as they stay on the road to face No. 20 Brown University in Providence, R.I. on Wednesday at 3 p.m.

the fifth inning. Veracka scattered five hits and fanned five in five innings, while Santos allowed one run over the final two to pick up the victory.

Braunstein was the offensive force for the Minutemen in game one, going 4–for–4 with a run scored and two RBI. Seven other UMass players also added a hit in the winning effort.

The second game was also a back and forth affair. Both teams held leads through the first five innings, but the Minutemen got the runs they would need to secure the victory in the sixth frame.

Freshman outfielder Mike Kulak, who hails from nearby Bristol, Conn., led off the decisive inning with a solo homerun into the Rolling Rock Cafe in right field. It was the rookie's second long ball of the day, as he also went deep in the first game.

"The wind was blowing out," said Kulak, who was playing his first game ever at Yale Field despite living only about 45 minutes from the ballpark. "We played a lot better as a team, which was something that we were struggling to do in out last few games."

Kulak's solo homer proved to be the spark that UMass would need to get the insurance runs that it was looking for. Morgan once again came through with a key single to ignite a Minutemen rally, and Hutchinson came on to run for the freshman catcher.

After the sophomore stole second base, Kaplan sacrificed Hutchinson over to third base. Pinch hitter Gavin Clark followed with a sharp grounder to third base that was snared by Elder, who dove back to the bag to tag Hutchinson, but to no avail. With runners on the corners, Skeffington then doubled to right center to plate a run before Mazzaferro's sacrifice fly brought home another.

Trailing 7–4 in the bottom of the seventh, the Bulldogs put together one final rally. After a fielders' choice to DeSantis, Yale designated hitter Tony Coyne, just missed a two–run homer to right field. Instead, his line drive bounced off the low fence, putting runners on second and third with one out.

Sophomore Nick Skirkanich entered the game at that point for starter David Loonie. The Cheshire, Conn. product induced Todd Kasper to bounce to first base for the second out of the inning before things got interesting.

Pinch–hitter Ben Teal worked the count full on Skirkanich before fouling off a pitch that UMass catcher Brian Samele appeared to hang on to. Instead it was ruled that the ball had hit the dirt first, giving Teal a new life. He made use of it by grounding to Kaplan, but the UMass shortstop pulled Lang off the bag, allowing a run to score.

An RBI double by Elder plated another run and closed the gap to 7–6, but Skirkanich beared down and forced Kahney to ground out to Kaplan to end the game.

Loonie went six and a third innings to earn his second win of the season for UMass. Offensively, Mazzaferro, Anderson and Kulak all added two hits each in the second game.

The Minutemen were also supposed to square off with Yale yesterday afternoon at Earl Lorden Field, but the game was postponed because of rain. UMass will next take to the diamond tomorrow afternoon when it travels to Storrs, Conn. to face UConn.

UMass baseball sweeps Yale and improves to 8–7 on the season

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

WEST HAVEN, Conn. — Late inning rallies were the specialty of the Massachusetts baseball team on Saturday afternoon at Yale Field.

The Minutemen squared off with their counterparts from Yale University in a doubleheader and came home with a pair of wins. UMass (8–7) swept the couplet by scores of 8– 2 and 7–6, and moved over .500 for the first time this season.

"For the most part I thought that we played a real good two games," UMass baseball coach Mike Stone said. "A lot of people contributed, and it was nice to see to everyone get involved and make a difference."

Game one was deadlocked at 2–2 heading into the top of the seventh before UMass broke the game open with six runs. Chris Morgan singled to start the rally and was replaced by pinch runner Keith Hutchinson. Senior co– captain Seth Kaplan followed with a single to left–center, and a hustling Hutchinson beat the throw of Yale left fielder R.D. DeSantis at third base. Kaplan also advanced to second on the throw.

With the No. 9 spot in the order up, Stone decided to pinch–hit for Nate Lang with junior Steve Asadoorian. On a 1–1 count Asadoorian laid down a suicide squeeze. Hutchinson scored easily from third on the bunt, but when Yale pitcher Matt McCarthy let the ball get by him, Kaplan scored all the way from second to give UMass a 4–2 lead.

"In that situation I wanted to put someone up there who I knew was a good bunter. It was nice to see it work out," Stone said. "We just want to put pressure on the defense and try to get them to make mistakes."

The floodgates quickly opened after the squeeze play. After a strikeout by Shaun Skeffington, Bryan Mazzaferro added a bunt single to put runners at first and second. Redshirt freshman Scott Anderson then drove home the two Minutemen with a double that increased the UMass lead to 6–2.

Another double by Aaron Braunstein, who had four hits in game one, plated Anderson and made it 7–2. The scoring finally closed out when a Yale error allowed Braunstein to score.

UMass held leads of 1–0 and 2–1 before Yale knotted the game in the home half of the sixth inning. Mike Kahney led off the inning with a single before John Elder sacrificed pinch runner Keith Reams to second base. Reams eventually scored on a two–out single by leadoff hitter Ben Johnstone.

Softball leaves Jersey with two tourney wins

After sweeping through Saturday's games, the Massachusetts softball team fell short of a perfect weekend yesterday morning during its final contest of the Princeton Invitational.

With the help of four first–inning home runs, Hofstra (10– 10) topped the No. 21 Minutewomen (15–7) 7–4 and prevented them from earning a weekend sweep.

UMass did respond with three first–inning runs of its own, but the Flying Dutchwomen countered with a two–run second inning that proved to be the deciding factor. After the Hofstra offensive surge, sophomore Carrie Jeffries entered the game in relief for the Minutewoman and allowed no hits though the final four frames.

Despite home runs by Nikki Faessler and Cherra Wheeler, UMass, who finished with a 2–1 mark in the round–robin, could not muster enough offense to keep pace with Flying Dutchwomen.

Although somewhat spoiled by the Hofstra defeat, the two– win weekend proved to be rather fulfilling for the Minutewomen, who received two outstanding contributions from a player often overshadowed.

More often than not, UMass pitching ace Danielle Henderson somehow manages to throw a complete–game shutout. But every so often, another pitcher rises to the challenge and mimics the remarkable ability of her All–America teammate.

After Henderson blanked border–state rival Connecticut 2–0 on Saturday, Jeffries followed two hours later with a 4–0 shutout of her own against the host Tigers.

The Placenta, Calif. native struck out three batters and scattered four hits through seven innings. The win allowed her team to finish the first day of competition with an unblemished record before its showdown with Hofstra.

Second baseman Mandy Galas anchored the Minutewomen offense with three RBIs. Ashely Bakken also added two hits for UMass, which rolled through the opening day of the tournament with two phenomenal pitching performances.

In the first game of the day against UConn, Henderson nearly collected her second no–hitter of the season. The senior sensation yielded a bloop single in the fourth inning to Huskie Abby Link. Despite losing her no–hit bid, Henderson remained focused and fanned 16 UConn hitters en route to one of her finest performances of the season.

Offensively, she was helped by freshman teammate Teri Runney who collected a hit and an RBI against Huskie pitcher Megan Biddle.

The Minutewomen will enjoy three days off until their home opener on Thursday, April 1. UMass is slated to play a double–header against arch rival Vermont.

Although the team will is waiting to play on its new field located adjacent to Southwest Residential area, UMass will compete on its old home field behind Totman Gym until the new facility is finished some time during this season.

Minutewomen Notes: During the team's trip to the Florida State Invitational last week, Jeffries became the 13th pitcher in school softball history to throw a no–hitter. Henderson also threw a no–hitter this season against Georgia during the same road trip.

In addition, Henderson was named WHMP Athlete of the Week and Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week. The senior pitching ace also led the Minutewomen to a landmark 1–0 victory over defending national champion Fresno State.

Men's lax loses heartbreaker, 8–7

By Sanford Appell

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — A year's worth of precious bragging rights between the Massachusetts and Hofstra men's lacrosse teams essentially came down to one possession on Saturday afternoon at Hofstra Stadium.

With the Flying Dutchmen leading 8–7, UMass received one last crack to knot up the affair when attackman Brad Obloj (who scored Hofstra's last goal) lost control of the ball giving UMass possession with less than a minute remaining in regulation.

UMass goalkeeper Chris Campolettano ran the ball approximately 20 feet in front of the net before feeding J.T. Benazzi at midfield, leading Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella to call time–out and set up for the last gasp attempt.

After the break in the action, the Minutemen set up their offensive formation with Jay Negus handling the ball near midfield.

The senior midfielder tossed the ball to Jeremy Guski who subsequently lobbed the ball well over the outstretched stick of John Madigan on a cross pass with 19 ticks remaining, effectively giving Hofstra its fourth win over UMass in its last five tries.

"The team played very well, but there is no good way to lose," Cannella said. "You can't tell [the players] it's okay to lose, because we play this game to win."

The contest was essentially a tale of two halves, as the Minutemen were stifled in the majority of their efforts in the first frame,as they trailed 5–2 heading into the locker room.

Furthermore, Hofstra was able to execute their attack– minded offense to their liking, as they outshot UMass 24–14 before intermission.

Hofstra midfielder Doug Shanahan was the first to light up the scoreboard, as he beat Campolettano unassisted only 46 seconds into the match.

After falling behind 2–0 by the end of the first quarter, UMass got their first tally early in the second period when Rich Kunkel broke through against Hofstra keeper Michael Demeo after a nice touch pass from John Madigan.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Jay Negus

After Joe Ghedian pushed the Dutchmen lead back to 2 at 3–1, Guski notched his sixth goal of the season in between Hofstra scores from Scott Dooley, and Tom Kessler to close out the first half production.

"I just told the team to come out and play hard in the second half," Cannella said. "We weren't shooting particularly well early, so we told them to come out and shoot high and hard, and the opportunities would come."

The Minutemen clearly took Cannella's words to heart, as they turned in one of their most impressive stretches of the season after taking the field for the second time of the afternoon.

UMass was sparked by the extraordinary play of sophomore attackman Kevin Dell who played a hand in three straight goals for UMass, who earned a fresh start with a 5–5 standstill with 2:51 to go in the third quarter.

Dell notched a goal followed by two assists in the surge that rejuvenated the collective psyche of the Minuteman squad.

"We were just working the ball around better in the second half," Dell said. "More importantly we were working harder, and good things happen when you hustle and play all out."

The game remained tied at five, at the end of three quarters, as Campolettano pitched a shutout in the period, fending off the three shots that came his way.

Keith Gabrielli gave the Minutemen their first lead of the day at 6–5 with 14:32 to go, as he launched a shot right in front of the net which Demeo had no realistic chance of blocking.

After Gabrielli's score which came on a man–up opportunity, the game became a see–saw battle, as Chad Eisenhart recorded his second goal of the game with 11:14 to play, before Mike Morley scored in one of the game's most exciting moments.

Morley penetrated the defense after receiving the ball from Don Little, and knifed his way through before beating Demeo for a 7–6 UMass edge.

Morley and the UMass bench exploded in jubilation, as a well–stocked UMass cheering section in the crowd joined in the brief celebration.

That would be the last shining moment for UMass on the day, as Frank Flocco and Obloj closed out the scoring and sent the Minutemen packing with their straight road loss on the year.

The loss was a particularly tough pill to swallow because of the implications of the heated rivalry because many of the UMass players are from the Long Island area.

"We'd love to get another chance at [Hofstra]," Dell said. "Most of us know each other on these teams, and there was a lot of trash talk throughout the game."

UMass will have a chance to rebound quickly as they host Baystate rival Boston College on Tuesday at Garber Field.

UMass women's lax can't compete with Orangewomen

Stephanie Pavlick hit two posts in the Minutewomen's 11– 2 loss to No. 19 Syracuse at the Carrier Dome Saturday afternoon.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

It was just that kind of a day. With 15:19 to go in a game that was quickly getting out of hand, midfielder Stephanie Pavlick of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team put herself in a position to improve on the 9–2 beating they were taking at the hands of No. 19 Syracuse (3–3) Saturday afternoon. She curled around a collection of Orangewomen to penetrate into the gut of the SU defense and whipped off a shot that Syracuse goalie Clothilde Ewing couldn't catch up to.

The ball raced over Ewing's shoulder and for a split second, the droves of local relatives of the visiting Minutewomen that came to the Carrier Dome to watch their kids play thought the slaughter was over. There was a lot of time still left, and with the deficit cut to 9–3 with the momentum favoring UMass (3–2), there might have been hope.

However, the shot ricocheted off of the upper right corner of the side bar of the goal and rocketed harmlessly away. Typifying the game, it was the second time that Pavlick was rejected by the barring on the goal.

The feelings of brief hope escaped as quickly as they had come. Before the final second ticked off the clock, Syracuse had improved their advantage to 11–2, and anyone wearing maroon and white just wanted to forget about the afternoon.

"This was disappointing," UMass Coach Francesca McClellan said. "[Our troubles] weren't something we practiced for. Kids weren't executing what (the coaches) asked them to execute."

Of the entire Massachusetts roster, the only one to really obtain the coach's praise after the debacle was junior defender Melissa Miele.

Miele, while playing stymieing defense, was the last Minutewoman to score, beating Ewing, who frustrated UMass with 14 saves on the day, with a free position shot at the 6:14 mark in the opening period. It was Miele's second goal of the young season.

The Massachusetts scoring was opened by senior co–captain Melissa Anderson with 19:48 to go in the first half, but by that time, the Orangewomen had already put three points on the scoreboard, and less than two minutes later, Syracuse midfielder Jenna Szyluk would fire the team's fourth goal, and the third for her.

"UMass is a really great team, it's just that I think we played so well that we counteracted it," Szyluk said.

Three other SU players would threaten to record hat tricks as well. Katrina Hable, Lauren Brady and Erica Hoffman all scored two goals apiece for the Orangewomen.

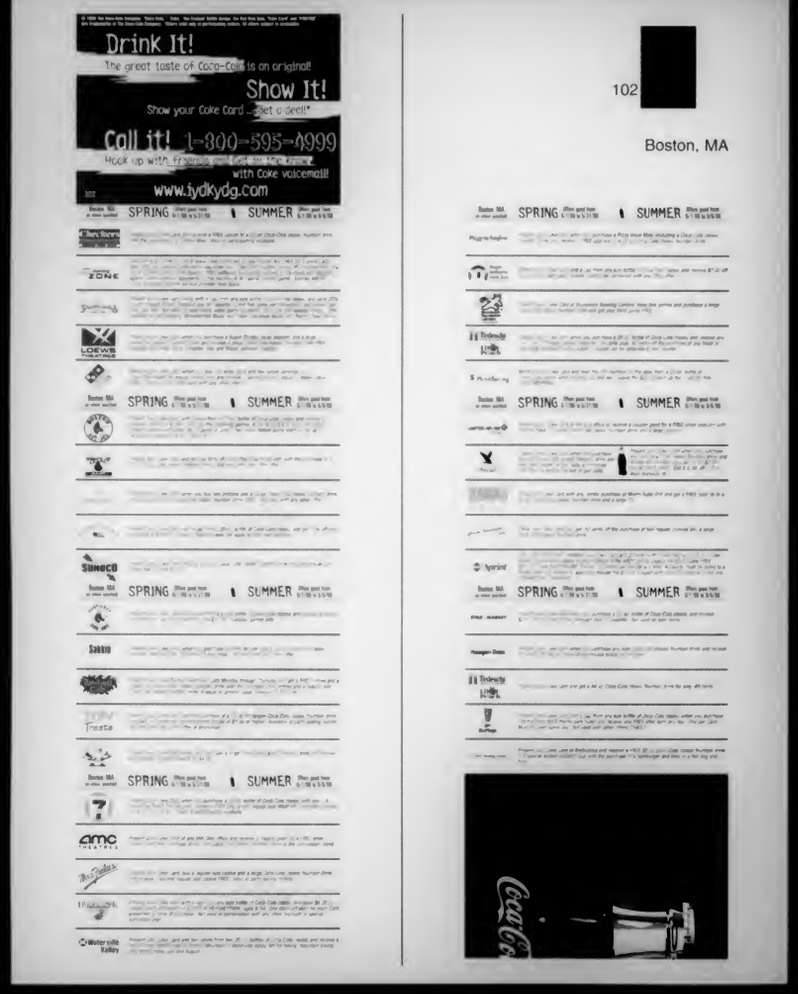
McClellan explained the Massachusetts offensive woes by saying that no one wanted to step into the spotlight.

"On our team, players were standing around watching everybody else do the work," McClellan said. "Everybody expected somebody else to do the scoring."

The Orange and Blue came out shooting in the second half as well, adding four goals in the first 10:30 of the closing period to jack their lead up to seven, 9–2.

Although the groundball count was even, 29–29, Syracuse obviously had a more game–ready defense, deterring 18 of UMass' 20 shots on the afternoon.

To make matters worse, defenders Colleen Wales and Shalee Merkle both missed the game and are out indefinitely. Wales injured her knee a week ago in an 8–6 win against New Hampshire, and was recently diagnosed with a tear in her anterior cruciate ligament. Merkle went down while practicing on the artificial turf of Richard F. Garber Field on Thursday night, and will most likely miss at least a month.



Both absences are key, and McClellan expressed that it was necessary that all the players must play better to fill their voids and compete with ranked teams like Syracuse and Wednesday's opponent, No. 20 Brown.

UM student names Chhim; tells of marijuana purchase

By Stacey Shackford and Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — University of Massachusetts freshman Jillian Swartz identified Sokha Chhim yesterday as one of three men who entered shooting victim Russell Bishop's Cashin dorm room Oct. 30 to buy marijuana.

Swartz is the fifth witness to testify in the criminal trial of Chhim, the Amherst high school student being accused of shooting former UMass engineering student Russell Bishop. The trial is being held in Hampshire County Superior Court.

The prosecution has alleged that Chhim bought one-eighth of an ounce of marijuana the afternoon of the shooting, returned with another high school student, Dana Roy, to purchase an additional four ounces and shot Bishop in the neck after an argument about the cost of the $1,100 transaction.

Swartz's testimony provided an essential piece of the prosecution's argument because it established that Chhim had been in the room earlier that day to purchase $40 worth of marijuana and that he arranged to return later.

"He was there to purchase some marijuana, at the time I think it was an eighth," Swartz said. "He was short [money], too. They started talking about what to do. [Chhim] indicated he wanted to come back later to purchase a lot more... [Chhim] asked if he should call or just stop by. Russ said he should just stop by."

Swartz said she had been in the room talking with Bishop, a casual acquaintance, as he ate chicken wings and smoked marijuana. Bishop offered her some marijuana, but she declined. She then heard a knock on the door and two Caucasian males named "Jason" and "Adam" entered with the intent to purchase marijuana. Bishop said in testimony Friday that he did not remember selling marijuana to anyone named "Adam."

"They were short the amount Russell had asked, but the deal went through anyways," Swartz said. "Russell and I continued to talk and he apologized for doing that [the transaction] in front of me."

Approximately 15 minutes later, Swartz said she heard another knock on the door and a male with a dark complexion entered the room, wearing a black cap and a white shirt with black and yellow stripes on the arm. His name was "Sokko" or "Sakko," she said.

Swartz then paused during her testimony and pointed to the defense table, identifying Chhim as the man she had met that afternoon.

Defense attorney Joseph Franco challenged Swartz's testimony while questioning Trooper Carol Zullo, a fingerprint expert from the Massachusetts State Police. Zullo had finger-printed a first-floor emergency exit door, the door knob and the left door jamb of Bishop's room and $971 in cash discovered in Bishop's possession.

None of the finger and palm prints — including those found on three $20 bills believed to be used in marijuana transactions — belonged to Chhim, Zullo said.

The defense also challenged UMass police detective Brian Narkewicz, the investigator who assembled the photo arrays Franco believes are "unduly suggestive."

Earlier in the trial, Franco submitted a motion to suppress identification testimonies involving the photographic arrays because they included Asian-looking pictures, even though each witness described the assailant as Hispanic. Chhim is Cambodian and Franco argues the arrays suggested the assailant was Asian.

Judge Judd Carhart denied the motion last Tuesday, saying that the arrays were "completely fair." Since then, witness identification based on the photographic arrays

Free–for–all in Select Board elections; students get chance to vote

By Jill Carroll

Elections, as prolific in March as mudpuddles, are once again summoning students to the polls today to vote for positions in the Town of Amherst.

There are two Select Board seats up for grabs but with five candidates, it will be up to the voters to determine who does and does not find a seat on the Board.

Marjorie R. Crossman, a retired nurse practitioner and resident of Amherst for 79 years, decided to run for the Select Board partly from encouragement and partly from a desire to see some changes.

Crossman said she would like to see the posters that cover bus stops and other areas removed, as well as garbage in the streets.

"The streets are not clean like they used to be," Crossman said. "I'm running on a platform of common sense and accountability."

Crossman has a hand in politics as a Town Meeting member and as part of the Citizens Accountability Committee. She also volunteered in the Town Manager's office and Town Clerk's office and is president of the Boys Club.

Crossman said if elected, her decisions would be primarily based on the permanent residents of Amherst but she understands the student's point of view after working as a nurse at Amherst College and Mount Holyoke College.

Paul DiBenedetto could not be reached for comment after several calls and leaving messages at his place of business. His home number was unavailable. However in a March 19 Amherst Bulletin article, DiBenedetto said he decided to run to contribute to the community. While not having any political experience, DiBenedetto said in the Bulletin that he has heard about the issues that concern Amherst residents from working in the community as an electrician.

One thing DiBenedetto said in the article he would like to do, is get things done in Amherst government quicker.

Prudencio Gomez Sr. decided to make a run for one of the two open Select Board seats to bring a more diverse representation of groups to the Board.

"A lot of people are not represented," Gomez said. "The town is taking care of the senior citizens and the small children but they don't do anything for the population in between."

Students can vote in SW

Elections are being held in Amherst today for several positions but the only two contested are the Select Board and Redevelopment Authority.

Polls will be open from noon to 8 p.m. all across Amherst. Polling places in University of Massachusetts Southwest Residential Area will be open for precincts 4A and 10A.

Whether living in a residence hall or renting an apartment in Amherst, anyone can vote as long as they fit voter registration criteria.

The criteria includes being: a U.S. citizen, at least 18- years-old and not registered in another location.

But Director of Commuter Services Joanne Levenson said student-voter turnout could be low.

"The past couple of years we've had students from the Select Board [but there] is not a student this year. Nobody is campaigning in the Residence Halls," Levenson said.

However, she said, If student-voter turnout was high, it would be an unexpected exception to the rest of the country.

ANC looks for answers in S.Africa

By Andrew Selsky
Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG — South Africa's haves will have to do more for its have-nots in the post-Mandela era, Deputy President Thabo Mbeki warned Saturday as he unveiled the ruling party's campaign platform.

"Selfishness... and disregard for the interests of the broader community are threatening our hard-won freedom," Mbeki told 1,000 guests at a theater north of Johannesburg where he launched the ruling African National Congress' "election manifesto."

When Mbeki wins the presidency in the June 2 elections, as he is virtually assured of doing, he will inherit the leadership of a country with vast disparities between the wealthy few — most of them whites — and the millions of blacks who remain impoverished. Mbeki succeeds Nelson Mandela, whose administration marked the first stage of South Africa's transformation from white rule to a multiracial democracy.

In a speech Saturday in the coastal city of Durban, Mandela heralded some of the accomplishments achieved since he won the country's first all-race elections in 1994, including the delivery of drinking water to 3 million more South Africans.

But Mandela, who is retiring after the June 2 elections, said much remains to be done.

"Reconstruction brings even greater challenges than defeating apartheid," Mandela told foreign dignitaries at an "African Renaissance Festival."

While Mandela has preached reconciliation and has not twisted the collective arm of whites to rectify wrongs of the past, Mbeki is expected to be tougher as he takes the country into its second stage of transformation.

"We will build on the foundations that have been laid... to achieve faster progress towards a better life for all," Mbeki said. "The ANC will be decisive in dealing with those who fail the people."

It's a theme Mbeki has been hitting with growing insistence, though he has been short on specifics. One option could include imposing heavier taxes on the country's top wage-earners.

Earth Day event closes streets to Amherst cars

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST— On the eve of Amherst elections that will change the composition of the Select Board, its members discussed warrant articles going before Town Meeting and closing North Pleasant Street for Earth Day.

The budgets of various items ranging from Community Services to the building a new golf course were approved last night. The budgets will have to go before Town Meeting in April for final approval.

The approval was a particularly heavy weight off the Board's shoulders after a million dollar debt was projected for fiscal year 2000 and over $600,000 in requests for funding could not even be factored into the budget. Board members had been trying hard to shrink various department's budgets and have listened to individuals from many groups pleading for their cause to receive funding.

One request for funding that was not included in the budget was for a Special Needs Director for Leisure Services Supplemental Education (LSSE). A petition was brought before the Board last night to allow the funding for the petition in the operating budget.

The director would organize and coordinate activities for special needs individuals. They would maintain projects, primarily the Open Arms project which pairs local students with special needs students, that will be losing their funding in June.

"The Special Needs Director would be a resource [to schools and other groups] on what is meant by full inclusion [of special needs individuals in the community]," said Gail Garrabrants, a Hadley resident and member of the advisory board of the Open Arms Project.

The Board said the position was worthwhile but the money just wasn't there.

"This was the most difficult thing for me to not include in the budget," said Town Manager Barry Del Castilho.

The problem is "too many people chasing too little money," said Board Member Homer Cowles, on his last night as a Board member. Cowles is not seeking re-election.

While the Board has had to turn down many requests when it comes to money, they were able to say 'yes' when it comes to the other kind of greenery.

U.S. claims Serbs still engage in genocide crime

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Clinton administration accused the Serbs yesterday of engaging in genocide against ethnic Albanians in Kosovo and said Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic could be tried as a war criminal.

"We abhor the ethnic cleansing that is now occurring in Kosovo," Vice President Al Gore told reporters in Chicago on a fund-raising trip.

"Ethnic Albanians are being driven from their homes, forced to flee their country in large numbers and in many cases are being murdered in cold blood," Gore said.

At the State Department, spokesman James P. Rubin said Milosevic's tactics amount to "crimes against humanity."

"We do believe that ethnic cleansing is going on. We do believe that there are houses burning. And we do believe that this is a campaign of forced expulsion," Rubin said.

He accused Serb military and police forces of "abhorrent and criminal action on a maximum scale." Rubin also detailed executions of ethnic Albanian schoolteachers, a negotiator and editor and hundreds of unarmed civilians.

Administration officials pledged, meanwhile, that the NATO offensive would go on and denied that the allies' attacks on the Serbs had prompted Belgrade to retaliate against ethnic civilians.

We had every reason to believe that they had both the intent and the capability to conduct massive offensive operations that would have been conducted with or without NATO airstrikes," Rubin said.

With the American public about evenly divided in its opinion of the NATO assault, the administration gave no ground either on the mission or that it holds Milosevic accountable for the havoc among Kosovo's civilian population.

"As a political matter, it is clear

Russia protests NATO airstrikes

By Judith Ingram
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Angry lawmakers on Saturday demanded an immediate halt to NATO airstrikes on Yugoslavia and called for upgrading Russia's military preparedness and freezing the START II nuclear arms reduction treaty.

President Boris Yeltsin and his deputies meanwhile searched for ways to support Yugoslavia without being drawn deeper into a conflict with the West.

Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov and Defense Minister Igor Sergeyev joined lawmakers in demanding an end to the bombing, but they said Russia could not risk a military confrontation with NATO.

Sergeyev said that Russia "on no account must slide into confrontation, much less drag (itself) into any military adventures."

Ivanov echoed that, telling the lower house of parliament, the State Duma, that Russia would not act rashly or threaten a military response to the NATO strikes.

"Those who expect Russia to act on impulse and retaliate with similar steps (to NATO's) are mistaken," he said in response to the proposal by some deputies that the Russian army be put on a higher state of combat readiness. The proposal was later dropped. The Duma voted 366 to 4, with two abstentions, to condemn the NATO attacks.

The resolution, which has no binding power on the government, also called for improving Russia's military preparedness, including "elaborating mobilization and operative plans," and temporarily putting aside the START II treaty.

It also called for an emergency meeting of the U.N. General Assembly. In a separate resolution, the Duma voted to cut off its own ties with NATO.

"Today we witness how the 19 most powerful countries are using modern weapons to annihilate" Yugoslavia, Communist leader Gennady Zyuganov told the Duma. He called on the Russian government to break the United Nations arms embargo against Yugoslavia.

Yet in its weakened state, Russia is in no position to directly confront the West despite Moscow's anger over the strikes. Russia is no longer a major military power, and needs Western financial help to revive its crippled economy.

Aside from angry rhetoric, the government so far has concentrated on largely symbolic actions and expressions of solidarity with Yugoslavia — leaving the door open for Russia to serve as a mediator in the conflict.

In a letter to Yugoslavia's President Slobodan Milosevic, Yeltsin pledged the "support of the Russian government to the people of Yugoslavia and support for decisive talks concerning the war-like acts of NATO," the Kremlin said Saturday.

The Duma resolution reflects the souring relations between the United States and Russia, which are at their lowest level since the end of the Cold War. One casualty of the rift appears to be the START II treaty, which both Ivanov and Sergeyev had urged the Duma to ratify in spite of the NATO airstrikes.

The lower house, the State Duma, had agreed to set the debate on the long-delayed agreement for Friday. But the Duma on Saturday called on Yeltsin to temporarily withdraw the START II treaty from consideration, where he had sent it for ratification.

Meanwhile, protesters staged a third day of rallies Saturday outside the American and British embassies in Moscow. About 2,000 protesters, many of them elderly people, gathered near the U.S. Embassy, where Communist leader Zyuganov and other speakers assailed the attacks against Yugoslavia.

that Slobodan Milosevic bears responsibility for the events that led to war crimes in Croatia, Bosnia and now Kosovo. Events in Kosovo obviously are being directed from Belgrade," Rubin said in suggesting the Yugoslav president could be charged by an international tribunal and face a lifetime prison sentence.

There are indicators genocide is unfolding in Kosovo," Rubin said after Secretary of State Madeleine Albright received a detailed report Sunday from Hashim Thaci, who headed the Albanian delegation that approved proposals for a settlement in Kosovo.

We have seen credible reports that four prominent Kosovar Albanian leaders have been executed by the Serbs," Rubin said. They included Fehmi Agani, a member of the Albanian negotiating group, and Baton Haxhiu, editor in chief of Koha Ditore, the Albanian-language newspaper in Pristina, the capital of Kosovo, Rubin said.

Thaci told Albright Yugoslav army, police units and paramilitary groups were killing civilians and burning houses, the fighting had spread to the cities — he described Pristina as `like a dead city' — and that his sense was the Albanians were overwhelmed, Rubin said.

The gravest situation, from his perspective, was the fate of 20,000 people taken from the Drenica region, Rubin said. The refugees, mostly women and children, were being held in what he called a kind of concentration camp in a munitions factory, and he was concerned they were being held as hostages or human shields, the spokesman related.

"We are not going to stand by and let that action occur with impunity," Rubin said.

Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon echoed Rubin's concern, saying NATO hit at least one column of Yugoslav military vehicles, but the task of attacking Serb army and police forces is being complicated because Serbs are using refugees as human shields.

had extensive experience managing as well as with government but said he did not wish to get into the specifics of his political experience.

He has had experience managing people through a variety of jobs including opening manufacturing facilities for several companies in Puerto Rico and owning various businesses.

Gomez's experience is backed up by his education. He has received a degree in mechanical engineering and a master's degree in management from Cambridge University in Boston.

If elected, he has plans for change that include students.

"You have to get the town and the University to really talk," Gomez said. "They need to realize the students are adults and have rights."

To avoid future problems between Amherst and the University of Massachusetts Gomez said the town needs to find a self-sustaining industry or business.

Amherst should "be self-sufficient and not depend only on the University."

Eva Schiffer, the only incumbent running for the Select Board, said her experience on the Board is just what makes her a good candidate.

"It's a long learning process," she said of being on the Select Board.

She said she feels the most important thing for a Board member to do is keep an open mind and weigh each side of an issue carefully.

But the Board is not the only place Schiffer has served in Amherst government. She was also on the Finance Committee for three years. She started her work in government on a committee to move the dog pound to where it is currently located.

In dealings with UMass, Schiffer is a former German teacher at UMass and says she wishes students were more involved in Amherst government.

"We have 2,000 student voters in Amherst and the level of interest is minimal," said Schiffer who also participates in the Problem Solving Partnership to address problems between UMass and the town. "Participation has not gone up. We regret it."

Carl Seppala, who has attended the majority of Select Board meetings over the past year, offers experience with both Amherst government and college students.

The elected member of the Amherst Redevelopment Authority and member of Town Meeting and the Parking Garage Building Committee, Seppala came to Amherst via the college town Athens, Georgia.

Seppala said he enjoys the student's presence in Amherst.

"We always have to keep in mind to make this always be a place the students would want to come to school," Seppala said.

After sitting through countless Select Board meetings, Seppala said he has learned that an open mind is the most valuable asset a Board member can have.

He said it is important to balance the different points of view on an issue.

has been the defense's primary focus throughout the trial.

But yesterday it was prosecutor David Ross who focused on the photographic arrays as Det. Narkewicz summarized each array's content, discussed to whom each array was shown and recounted the identifications made by the witnesses.

Narkewicz also discussed his own observations the night of the shooting. When he arrived on the scene, Narkewicz stepped off the elevator and immediately observed "green vegetable matter" on the floor, which he believed to be marijuana. He followed the trail of marijuana to Bishop's room, collecting it as he walked. There he found technicians from the Amherst Fire Department working on Bishop, who was laying on the floor.

On Nov. 18, Narkewicz searched Chhim's room in his parent's house at 16 Amherst Crossing. There, he recovered a black hat from the top shelf of Chhim's closet, a plastic bag containing marijuana, and a plastic Powerade bottle "modified in a way consistent with a homemade pipe, also referred to as a bong."

The trial continues at 9 a.m. today and will last until 4 p.m.; it is expected to end tomorrow.

Russia Premier To Go to Belgrade

By GEORGE JAHN
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Ground-attack jets took off for Kosovo on Monday as part of NATO's expanded attacks on the Serb forces carrying out a `scorched earth policy" in the separatist province.

While tens of thousands of ethnic Albanian refugees flooded neighboring countries, specialized A-10 "Warthog" planes were spotted taking off from Aviano Air Base in northern Italy. The A-10 is a low- and slow-flying tank-killer aircraft that could be used to strike Serb ground forces.

Air raid sirens blared Monday evening in Belgrade, the Yugoslav capital, and two detonations shook Pancevo, six miles to the north, marking the beginning of a sixth night of bombing.

As new atrocities were reported in Kosovo, Russia's prime minister announced he was going to the Yugoslav capital of Belgrade on a peace deal, and rallies for and against the airstrikes took place in London, New York, Prague and other cities.

NATO spokesman Air Commodore David Wilby said the latest air attacks targeted Serb and Yugoslav units involved in atrocities in Kosovo, a province in Serbia, the main republic in Yugoslavia.

There are indications genocide is unfolding in Kosovo," said James P. Rubin, the State Department spokesman, citing reports of summary executions and people being forced from their homes at gunpoint.

Wilby said NATO had received reports that Fehmi Agani, an ethnic Albanian negotiator at recent peace talks in France, was `executed' on Sunday and that others had gone into hiding.

EAST LANSING, Mich. (AP) — A riotous crowd of about 5,000 people gathered around an apartment complex close to the Michigan State campus shortly after the Spartans lost to Duke Saturday in basketball's Final Four.

At least two fires and an overturned car were reported. Campus police Capt. Tony Kliebecker said the department sent its riot unit in to quell the crowd that had gathered around the Cedar Village apartment complex.

Kliebecker said he's heard of at least two arrests made by campus police.

"Right now, we're just trying to move crowds. We can't keep up with it," he said.

When asked if there were any problems, an East Lansing police dispatcher said: "Major problems. We're under a state of emergency right now. That's all we know."

At least one student was injured. He was climbing up a traffic light pole and he fell.

The Spartans' season came to an end Saturday night to heavily favored Duke. The Spartans managed to give the top-ranked Devils a challenge before falling 68-62.

LONG BEACH, Calif. — A rocket roared off a converted oil platform floating in the equatorial Pacific Saturday in the first test of an international venture's oceangoing satellite launch system.

The Ukrainian- and Russian-built Zenit-3SL rocket carried a dummy satellite as it lifted off from the Odyssey, a self-propelled platform stationed 1,400 miles south of Hawaii.

Fueled by kerosene and liquid oxygen, the three-stage rocket ignited and engulfed the platform in a cloud of smoke, then rapidly hurdled toward space. About an hour later, the satellite separated from the third stage at an altitude of 1,200 miles and continued on toward its planned position 23,000 miles above Earth.

Sea Launch Co.'s inaugural launch was conducted from mission control on the accompanying ship Sea Launch Commander.

"Everything looks good right at the moment," Sea Launch president and general manager Allen Ashy said from the ship. Company officials watched by satellite video link to Long Beach, home port for the two vessels.

The launch was delayed more than three hours by minor problems with support equipment. The company, citing cautiousness, had already pushed it back one day.

DOWNERS GROVE, Ill. (AP) — There were tears and expressions of pain on all sides when a jury of United Methodist ministers decided to suspend one of their own for blessing the "holy union" of two Chicago men.

Now church leaders must decide what to do about a divide that some say only grew deeper when the guilty verdict against the Rev. Gregory Dell was read late Friday.

After two long days of testimony, 10 of 13 pastors - many of them friends of Dell — found him guilty of disobeying a church law that bans same-sex unions in the United Methodist Church.

His suspension goes into effect July 5, putting Dell's 30-year career as a Methodist minister on hold.

Dell, who hadn't expected such a harsh sentence, said he was disappointed by a ruling he thinks was based on "a kind moralistic rigidity and legalism that shuts people out."

"The church has made a statement today, but It has not made the final word," Dell said outside the Methodist church in the Chicago suburb of Downers Grove where the trial took place.

Methodist pastors in several states, including California, Nevada and Iowa, are facing similar charges.

But Dell's case was the first to test the church's same-sex union ban, which went into effect in August one month before Dell presided over the commitment ceremony of Karl Reinhardt and Keith Eccarius, an eight-year member at Dell's Broadway United Methodist Church on Chicago's North Side.

The jury said Dell's suspension could be lifted if he signs a statement promising to obey the ban or if church officials decided to rescind the ban. Dell said he wouldn't.

"I will not abandon the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered persons in my pastoral care ... or any other group that our society decides to marginalize out of fear or ignorance," said Dell, whose congregation is a third gay or lesbian.

They conquered everything but death.

Past world rulers like Alexander the Great, Tutankhamen and Julius Caesar have all had one thing in common: the past. They're stuck in it. It makes more sense to follow a ruler who has conquered death... and a world leader who promises to someday rule the world through peace.

Jesus Christ is that ruler. He claimed to be God, was crucified for our sins, and then rose bodily from the grave. And he promises to return to rule over the earth. For a free article on this remarkable person and his relevance for your life, call 1-800-236-9238.

History repeats in Kosovo

In an attempt to explain his actions, last week, the Serbian President, Slobodan Milosevic was reported as saying that the Serbian state could not tolerate a revolutionary state on its border. Ironically, this it precisely what the emperor of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Franz Josef, said nearly 25 years before the start World War I — he was speaking about the revolutionary Serbia.

> "The people being attacked generally become more angry and aggressive, seeking to exact revenge on the perpetrators."
> Emily Trask

In June 1914, the definitive events that led up to World War I and by default World War III ironically began to unfold in Serbia. Although cliched, I believe that it's true that "History repeats itself." And as I helplessly watch this "military action" in Kosovo, it appears that there is definite potential for "history to repeat itself," in more ways than one.

When I first heard about the prospect of "NATO" plans for a military action in Kosovo, I was physically sickened. It seems blatantly apparent to me that U.S. aerial assaults in Yugoslavia are a complete and total mistake.

There is a pervasive belief among government and military officials that airstrikes will demoralize a population, but in fact what happens is just the opposite. The people being attacked generally become more angry and aggressive, seeking to exact revenge on the perpetrators. They become more unified — willing to sacrifice their lives for the preservation of their country. This has been proven in every war that has used air raids in this century.

Last week, on a private Serbian entertainment television channel called Pink, the movie "Twins" with Arnold Schwarzenegger was pre-empted by "The Battle for Kosovo," an epic about the defeat of Serbs by Turks in the 14th century. This demonstrates the prevalence of nationalistic sentiment that is embedded in the Serbian cultural memory.

This deep-rooted cultural consciousness is something that we as Americans have absolutely no concept of. Yet, another reason why I believe that the U.S. government should not have been so hasty in ordering assaults on Serbia. We simply do not and cannot easily understand the situation of a people who are still bitter about a defeat that took place over 600 years ago.

President Clinton, himself, admittedly said that he didn't know much about Yugoslavia, but that he was "reading up on the area."

Although many U.S. senators, from both parties, have expressed their doubts about sending American pilots to Kosovo, they still voted to send them. John McCain, an Arizona Republican who supported the attack, explained this uncertainty, "Congress and the American people have good reason to fear that we are heading toward another permanent garrison of Americans in a Balkan country where our mission is confused and our exit strategy a complete mystery."

This statement sounds eerily like that of the doubts that were later admitted by governmental officials concerning the Vietnam War.

It has also been acknowledged by U.S. officials that our involvement could affect the broader relationship between Russia and the United States, yet they are still willing to proceed. This arrogance on the part of our government is absolutely amazing to me. While we are basically the only super power in the world at this point, throughout history, all dynasties have crumbled. Our high and mighty position is bound to fall at some point.

The former Soviet Union is in political and economic upheaval right now. There is also a very strong military presence within the government. This tedious position is not something that should be messed with. One false move, internally or externally, could prove to be fatal. These unstable elements were also present in Germany on the eve of World War II, when the Nazi party came to power.

I realize that the U.S. is faced with a difficult moral dilemma, but these types of atrocities also are and have been happening elsewhere in the world. As a concerned citizen, I must ask, "Why are we choosing to get involved here?" There have been terrible things happening in Rwanda and we basically have done nothing. In Afghanistan, there is gender apartheid which has prevented women from getting medical care, in turn causing an enormous number of unnecessary deaths. Not only have we not become involved there, but we actually had a hand in bringing the present government to power. But of course, we rarely hear anything about that.

What the Serbians are doing in Kosovo is absolutely abhorrent, but they did not invent ethnic cleansing. And the countries who are assisting the U.S. in launching these attacks on Serbia — Italy, Germany, Britain, and France — do not have the most spotless historical records in terms of humanitarian atrocities.

I agree that something should be done to stop what is going on, although I don't think it can be stopped with military power (especially air power) alone. As we have been shown in the past, without ground forces nothing significant can be accomplished. This would mean a full fledged commitment by the U.S. — a deep quagmire from which I am afraid we would have a very difficult time getting out of.

While we believe that the world is for the most part in a state of tranquility, it is strangely reminiscent of the state of Europe at the start of World War I. Today in 1999, once again in the Balkaans, the stage is set... There is a very real potential for a major worldwide conflict that everyone seems to be ignoring.

Letters to the Editor

A nice election

To the editor:

As you may know, in past years, presidential campaigns at UMass have not been as clean as they should have been. Some have even gone well beyond the boundaries of morality and legality. This year, however, I would like to thank all of the candidates for running a clean campaign. It was good to see the trend of excessive negative campaigning end.

More than clean, I found the campaign to be quite amiable. While some individuals did not get along, the general feeling that I found on the campaign trail was a good one and I think that is the way it should be. The important thing to consider is that when you get right down to it, we are all on one side: the side of the students. No matter who wins, we all have to work together for the common good. In the year to come, so it is very important to start on the right foot. As the SGA has shown us over the past year, fighting amongst ourselves gets us nowhere.

During the campaign, I felt that almost all of the candidates running were worthy of their respective office. No matter what the results of the election, the students would still win. While I am, of course, disappointed that I did not win myself, I would like to congratulate President- elect Howe and Trustee-elect Avakian and to wish them the best of luck in the coming year. Based on what they have said during their campaign and in their letter published in the The Daily Collegian on Monday, March 29, I look forward to an exciting year for the SGA with them at the helm.

I would also like to thank all those who helped me with my campaign, without whom I would not have done nearly as well as I did. Additionally, I would like to thank all those who voted, whether they voted for me or any of the other worthy candidates. Thanks to them, we had one of the highest voter turnouts the SGA has seen. Also, I extend special thanks to all those who did have enough faith in me to cast their votes in my direction. While I did not win, I will continue to work with the SGA to make it the best it can be for all students of the University.

Reading blues

For years I have been unable to solve a dilemma I perhaps have always had in my mind. Why is it that I become instantly engrossed in a book a friend recommends to me to read, yet when it comes to school work, I look at reading books as a constant torture?

Often the biggest challenge in reading for class is not understanding a book's messages, but simply staying awake enough hours to complete it. On rare occasions when I read a book for pleasure, I can go hours without eating or even moving. Yet, for class, I constantly fidget when reading and mindlessly snack on foods.

Such an intense contradiction in my opinion on reading have led me to compare the differences between how I approach books in these two situations. I looked back throughout my life and very rarely remember looking forward to reading.

Jason Wiesenbach

My perception of reading has basically been as a requirement, littered with deadlines, scanning for paper topics and analyzing form. Yet, even with my aversion to reading in high school and college, I have persisted and worked for an English degree. Perhaps then, it is the different experiences I have reading books outside class.

In the past few months, my best friend has recommended two books to me. Never once did they make me sleepy or bored, but instead I was annoyed when I had to stop reading. I did not have to constantly analyze the book, but instead could relax within its fictional world and read it as purely a work of art.

This leads me to believe that it is not the books that bother me. I loved those two books and always feel there are books I read in classes that I should have enjoyed more. Instead, I feel it is the structure of my classes that have deterred me from readings which I know I can love.

When I approach a book for class, my mind does not relax because in order for me to write a paper or to be prepared for a test on the book, I must be alert to everything. This for me creates stress when combined with the prospect of grades, and in turn makes me read not for enjoyment, but to complete an assignment and earn a grade.

Now, of course, if grades are truly unimportant for me, I should just ignore them, right? As much as I would love to do so, I cannot, for grades translate into a job, which then becomes money. I simply cannot read or write every day, unless I am making money to keep myself from poverty.

Thus, these feelings of stress, the need for good grades to get a job later on, and all the competitiveness this fosters are what I come with to any given class. Moreover, the material I have read for discussion most likely was filled with bouts of sleep and boredom, not because of the book but because of all these underlying feelings about earning my degree.

Unfortunately, in this semester and the previous one, I have become so disrespectful of the constant structure of earning grades and then earning money, that I have nearly ceased doing the homework. This is because I knowingly cannot relax the way I want to at any time during homework nor do I have the desire to live in the capitalist world of stress and money after graduation this May.

I constantly find myself rejecting homework in favor of five hours of deep conversation or of writing a fantastical poem. I also wish that those same conversations about a book my best friend and I have could be translated into class.

To achieve that same atmosphere in a class, though, I would have to be comfortable with my classmates. No, not just in a way in which we can respect each others' opinions, but in a way that they are my acquaintances. I certainly do not wish to be friends with all my classmates, but I know that after just a few hours of talk with new people I meet, I feel immensely more relaxed.

But, I would also have to not be concerned with money and the stress that it causes, which no class can help me with. I have had some fine professors here, but no matter how hard they try, they cannot make me ignore the inevitable stress of earning money in a job I most likely will never truly love.

It seems, then, that my problems in classes are very similar to those in the job world. Both involve often high amounts of stress, deadlines, and the constant goal is to eventually earn money. None of these will make me happy; instead they get in the way of all the things that appeal to me.

Thus, I feel the only way to eliminate all of these stresses I dislike so much would be for America to stop focusing on money and competition and instead focus on personal well- being and happiness, not money.

However, living in a country obsessed with progress and capitalism, I will likely never see a time when I can do things to be happy, instead of for money. As I graduate, I find I am faced with a life of constant stress over the holy dollar and wondering what the benefits are to this progress we so seek.

I wonder what is the ultimate aim of this capitalist progress, which forever will empower the very rich to exploit the poor. Is this really what everyone wants? This love of money and progress makes people believe it is what they want. However, for me they not only preclude my enjoyment of university classes, but my happiness itself.

Winter's Tales

Winter is over. Yea! But beat the drum slowly because our good friend Jack Frost has gone on to meet his maker.

Aww, hell, who am I kidding? I hate friggin' winter. I'm glad that beast is dead, even if he didn't leave me anything. Allow me to share with you, if I may, some of my fondest memories of this past winter.

"The Great Bowl Snow Fight." Or, to be more accurate, "The Really, Really Lame Bowl Snow Fight." Seriously, this was the worst, most stupid snowball fight I have ever seen. The people formed rough teams on opposite sides of the bowl in Orchard Hill, made some snowballs, and then rushed across the open space. Braveheart-style, screaming like they were about to murder some nuns. This lasted for approximately three seconds. That's how long it took for everybody to throw their two snowballs, miss, and then retreat to make more.

Rob Schulze

Mere words cannot convey the pathetic scene. I don't think anybody got a direct hit all night. This is what passes for excitement up on ol' Orchard Hill, where the honors students roam free. Heck, even Sylvan has some real crime. What I wouldn't give.

Another memory is the wind. I don't know if anybody else besides me noticed this, but back in September and October, when it was hotter than Satan's butt cheek on the john, there wasn't a breath of air in this whole damn valley. Being from a coastal town I was kind of used to a little sea breeze or something, but there was absolutely no air movement that wasn't created by little Wal-Mart fans in people's dorm rooms.

Then winter set in, with snow, freezing ice, wolves, death, etc., and all of a sudden the campus became Wind Central. You couldn't go anywhere without being buffeted by hurricane-force gales, which of course brought the temperature down to a nice even negative 50 degrees. And I'm not even going to talk about that wind tunnel between the library and South College. Now that the weather's warming up I'm wary that the wind will gradually go back into hibernation and grow strong for next winter, leaving behind only the stain of its memory.

I remember winter break. You do remember winter break, don't you? That month of wasted life? Of course you do. I had Christmas with (ugh) my family. I worked nine hours a day at Stop & Shop, smiling at the complaining old people while mentally figuring out the best way of to break their necks with one smooth motion, Jean-Claude Van Damme style.

I, personally, would think that once you got to be a certain age it wouldn't matter whether broccoli was $1.12 or $1.22 a pound. When I'm eighty, I plan on looking back on my long, fruitful life and saying, with an air of nostalgia and satisfaction, "Holy S! I'm going to die soon!" Then I will spend all my savings on heroin and hookers, and if broccoli is ten cents more expensive, then so be it. I will have other things to think about.

Of course, that wasn't all the joy of my winter break. There was the, uh, great, real great New Year's party, parts of which I can even think about without wincing. All the fun times spent with my friends... at a bowling alley. Now that I think about it, the only really good thing about my break was The Legend of Zelda. Link is definitely a good friend to have over a vacation.

Last, but not by any means least, was the most horrendous aspect of this winter just past. I'm talking, of course, about my jacket. (Thought I was going to say "tension in the Balkans," didn't you? You need to get your priorities straight. And stop kidding yourself. You don't even know where the Balkans are.) I can't blame anyone else for this one. I picked it out personally and without supervision, which was, of course, the mistake. I have the worst taste in clothes possible. So I ended up with this enormous puke-green amorphous trillion-pocket Eskimo parka thing. This is one of those jackets where, even if the temperature is -37 degrees, and even if you are wearing nothing but Vaseline underneath, you will still sweat profusely.

Winter, however, is gone. Now I can turn my sights towards the wonders of spring, let the past rest, and go forward with a new, better attitude. Or something.

Cool air from Philly's Roots

The Root's latest album, "Things Fall Apart," is the latest in a long line of innovative successes.

THINGS FALL APART
The Roots
MCA

In the tumultuous world of hip-hop, consistency comes like a gusty breeze on a sweltering day. All too often musical stagnation lurks and few crews have the wherewithal to escape conventionality and consistently exhale a full album of innovation.

When the Roots unleashed Organix in 1993, perhaps we weren't ready to embrace the notion that rap music could thrive under the broad confines of live instrumentology. Yet with gleeful, sample-less wizardry, Organix pulsated with infectious energy, instilling a refreshing nuance of melodically raw, strictly live hip-hop. While some branded them as 'alternative', the Roots stormed back a year later with their bona-fide classic Do You Want More!!???!!, certifying themselves as Philly's finest innovators and hip- hop's fresh air. By 1996 the Roots crew were at it again, blowing up stereo-sets with the symphonic, hard-hitting tunes of Illadelph Halflife, once again prove that the 5th Dynasty was a formidable sound force. With a soulful assembly of natural rhythms, the Roots have returned to bless the musical community with their fourth full-length effort, Things Fall Apart.

The album begins with simplistic ethnocentricity, usurping various quotes (notably from Spike Lee's Mo Better Blues.) On "The Next Movement," Black Thought leads us through an excursion of tingling sounds coupled with the delicate chorales of the Jazzyfanastees. He waxes poetical poignancy proclaiming, "this is directed to everybody in range/ yo, the whole state of things in the world is about to change/ black rain falling from the sky looks kinda strange/ the ghetto is red hot we steppin' on flames..." The artistry continues on "100% Dundee," as musicology is personified with a thump- induced groove and a luscious background. Diversely Thought is joined by Mos Def on "Double Trouble," a b-boy anthem bubbling with old-schoolism. "Love of My Life" features label-mate Common, who flexes his baritone bravado and "Adrenaline" is a pulse-racing pendulum of lyricism. "The Relm" is fueled with sonic percussion as Malik B vocalizes his own profound prowess.

Despite its overplay, "You Got Me" is a shimmering ballad that features catchy guitar work and the chocolatey- smooth voice of Erykah Badu. This memorable memento transforms perfectly into a ridiculously dope drum and bass pattern tapped by 7questlove. (We're anxiously awaiting the jungle remix.)

With 7uest (on drums), Kamal (on keys) and Leonard Hubbard (on bass) enriching the background, and Rahzel "the Godfather of Noyze" providing manipulative vocal gymnastics, the album overflows with musical decadence.

Although not every song is as good as the last, the overall composition is packed with a jumbalaya of flavors that satisfy sound cavities endlessly. All in all, Things Fall Apart proves to be another gusty breeze of consistency exhaled by the Roots. A-

ANIMA ANIMUS
The Creatures
Instinct

You don't have to root through the wreckage of the post- punk era to find something worth listening to. Although Blondie's new album proved that maybe being a retro-act isn't all that bad, The Creatures have produced a highly enjoyable album.

For those of you who are scratching your heads saying, "I don't remember The Creatures," relax. The husband and wife duo that are The Creatures include Siouxsie Sioux and Budgie. Does that help jog your memory?

Ever since Siouxsie and the Banshees broke up after the lackluster 1995 album, The Rapture, lead vocalist Siouxsie and drummer Budgie (Q: Does anyone know the Banshees' original drummer? See answer at bottom of article.), have been performing as The Creatures as a full time gig. Before the breakup it was a side project to allow Siouxsie and Budgie more creative freedom from the restrictions of the Banshees and Siouxsie's songwriting partner Steve Severin. Their first EP, Wild Things, was released in 1981.

The Creatures' work seemed to only improve over the years while the Banshees' suffered. The last great Banshees' singles were "Kiss Them For Me" and "Face to Face" in 1991 and '92 respectively. Ju-Ju and Peepshow were the Banshees at their best. As time went on, their albums declined in quality, but their singles were nothing short of excellent.

Anima Animus is the third Creatures LP, and arguably their best to date. Starting off with the first single "2nd Floor" The Creatures follow the trend of goth bands turning to electronica — much like recent releases from Love and Rockets and Peter Murphy (or the artists formerly known as Bauhaus). But Siouxsie and Budgie cannot be criticized for this — that's why they created The Creatures in the first place: to experiment. Granted, although this sound resembles Curve more than Siouxsie and the Banshees you can't say that Toni Halliday wasn't at all influenced by Siouxsie.

"Disconnected," (very Curve-sounding) "Turn It On," (Budgie's drumming displayed to perfection) "Pretties' Thing" and "I exterminating Angel" (featuring additional production by Juno Reactor) are all high-caliber tracks. There are few songs on Anima Animus that are not worthy of being released as singles. This is one of the first truly great albums of the year.

The Creatures are not a xerox copy of a once excellent band trying to relive its former glory, like Blondie or Echo and The Bunnymen. Rather, The Creatures are a new entity. Although everything The Creatures do is going to resemble Siouxsie and the Banshees to some extent, with Siouxsie's voice and Budgie's drums, they are looking ahead and taking things in a new direction — not dragging through the recycling bin. Very rarely will anyone find lost gems that way. (Oh, almost forgot. A: Sid Vicious). A+

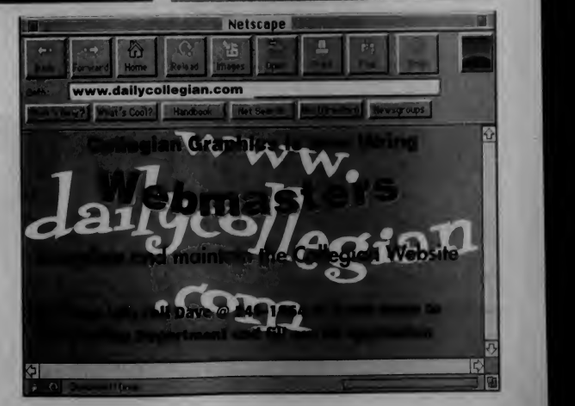
He's no Houdini.

The great escape artist Harry Houdini vowed that his greatest feat would be to rise from the grave.

He didn't deliver. But someone else did. The man claimed to be the God who created the Universe. And said he would die and then bodily rise from the dead to prove he was God.



Jesus Christ's resurrection from the dead distinguishes him from all other religious leaders.

Jewish news around the world

As college students, we often struggle to keep up with current events, and sometimes Jewish news is hard to come by. My column will help you navigate the hot issues around the Jewish world.

America

To begin at home, there has been much talk about the recent release of the movie, "Life is Beautiful." Many appreciated its original approach in portraying the Holocaust experience. Despite the movie's raving reviews, many written by Jews, some American Jews have felt uncomfortable with the idea of a Holocaust movie with a humorous backdrop. The movie was given further exposure last week when Italian actor Roberto Benigi, who also co- wrote and directed "Life is Beautiful," won an Oscar for Best Actor in the film.

Elana Silverman

In other American news, a progressive Orthodox group called Edah (Hebrew for "community") held their first international conference last month in New York.

The group's slogan is "The courage to be modern and Orthodox" and workshops at the conference focused on the current burning issues of the modern Orthodox community. Included in the discussions were the topics of feminism in Orthodoxy, democracy and Judaism in Israel and relating to beloved non–Orthodox or intermarried family members.

The conference was met with much applause by those who feel the Orthodox community has moved too much to the political right, and with criticism from those who claim the group has an overly liberal approach.

Israel

There is a flurry of political activity in Israel in anticipation of the upcoming May 19 elections. A new centrist party has emerged, challenging the traditional two- party race between Labor and Likud.

The new centrist party, called "One Israel," is led by Yitchak Mordechai, Benjamin Netanyahu's former defense minister. The party has gained the growing support of a vocal minority, but has had trouble pinpointing its specific agenda and goals.

In other news, a major bomb attack on Tel Aviv was thwarted by the Israeli police with the cooperation of the Palestinian security forces. The terrorists had already managed to smuggle explosives into the city, but were caught after the Israeli police were tipped off by the Palestinian authorities. Thrilled at such cooperation, Netanyahu telephoned Yasir Arafat to thank him personally.

Arafat met with President Bill Clinton two weeks ago to discuss the possibility of a unilateral declaration of Palestinian statehood on May 4.

Arafat refused to give details of the hour-long deliberations between himself and Clinton on the issue. May 4 marks the originally-scheduled date for a settlement on the "final status" agreements dealing with some of the most complicated issues of the peace process.

These issues include a settlement with Syria over the Golan Heights, which Israel annexed after having won the area in the 1967 war, in addition to a final decision on the status of Jerusalem and the establishment of a Palestinian state. Clinton and other Western leaders have urged Arafat to postpone his declaration, warning that it would eliminate the chances of the peace process being restarted after the upcoming elections.

Netanyahu has made it clear that if a state is unilaterally declared on May 4, there will be an aggressive Israeli response, such as annexing areas of the West Bank.

Russia

There has been increasing local and international concern regarding a new wave of anti–Semitism in Russia led by right–wing nationalist political forces in the government and other positions of power.

These politicians scapegoat the Jews for Russia's continuing economic troubles. Two weeks ago, in his first public statement about the problem, Russian prime minister, Yevgeny Primakov assured that he was doing all he could to abate the increasing anti–Jewish propaganda.

Many of Russia's Jews are unconvinced that enough is being done, and as a result there has been an influx in the continuing exodus of Russian Jews to Israel. Russian immigrants in Israel number in the hundreds of thousands and have two political parties volleying for seats in the Knesset (Israel's parliament) in the upcoming elections.

Stay tuned for future updates and have a kosher and happy Passover!

"Nice Jewish Girl" questioned

Let's play some word association, shall we? Negative depictions of Jewish women. There's the JAP. (Jewish American Princess), of course, and then the Jewish Mother. And now, premiering soon in a joke-book near you, the Nice Jewish Girl.

Come on, gentlemen, you know her. The lovely, educated, sheen mutzel your grandmother is always trying to set you up with. As a teenager, your parents sent you to hundreds of conferences, Shabbatons and youth group meetings with the hope that you'd meet the perfect Jewish girl.

Chanel Dubofsky

But who is she, really, this paragon of an intelligent, pious Jewish woman? Is this really a flattering concept? Should it be associated with derogatory images of Jewish women, such as the I.A.P.?

On the surface, there is nothing derogatory about this idea. After all, this woman is educated, well-versed in Jewish law and liturgy and active in the Jewish community. But as we examine the idea more closely, it begins to seem a little disparaging. "Nice Jewish Girl" is synonymous with the idea of a woman who will eventually consent to be behind her husband, rather than with him. This woman might serve on the Board of Directors at a synagogue, but chances are, she would never be the rabbi. Her role would become regulated to one frequently held by Jewish women. She would be responsible for the Jewish education of her children, and this is seen as her primary role.

Now, I recognize that Judaism is indeed matrilineal. I am in no way down–playing the importance of a Jewish education, both in the home or outside of it. But this position of being the "Nice Jewish Girl" does smack of something a little... treyf. When we use the phrase "nice Jewish boy," are we talking about the same thing? Certainly, he would be a young man, a mensch of sorts, knowledgeable in Jewish law, able to lead Shabbat services and read Torah, but his parents hope he will become a doctor or lawyer. If he is to be active in religious life, he will ascend the bimah himself.

Perhaps the stereotyped gender roles don't exist so prominently in the reconstructed, renewed Judaism we have today. However, if the I.A.P. can survive long enough to be nagged by her Jewish mother, the nice Jewish girl can definitely remain as well.

As we as Jewish women move toward a redefinition of ourselves, we must struggle out from under all stereotypes, even if they appear to have redeeming qualities. I'm not suggesting that we should all rebel against the institution of marriage or refuse to have children, but we must show that although we are crucial to the development of the next generation of Jews, a "Nice Jewish Girl" can also be one who invites change into the Jewish community in ways which perhaps are not so traditional. It is vital to have a diverse concept of what a Jewish woman is, and it must be a positive concept, which we as Jewish women and men can be proud of.

Passover: A holiday for remembrance and reflection

Passover is one of my favorite holidays for many reasons. It is also a very meaningful holiday for many Jewish people. Let me give you a brief explanation of the holiday and tell you why I love it so much.

The holiday itself symbolizes the Exodus from Egypt when the Hebrews (Jews) were slaves. Passover lasts for eight days. The word Passover comes from the story of Ramses II (Pharaoh)'s control over Hebrew slavery, the ten plagues and the escape from Egyptian slavery. When the Hebrews were slaves in Egypt, Moses (an adopted son of Pharaoh) found out he was a Hebrew, and helped to free his people with the assistance of God. God was annoyed with the Egyptians, and consequently cursed them with ten plagues, including frogs, blood for water, locusts and hail. During this time, Pharaoh ordered the first born son in each Hebrew family to be killed. God returned harshly, creating a plague that the first son of every Egyptian family died. The Hebrews were told to put the blood of a lamb on their doorposts so that they would be passed over by the angel of death. Thus, the name Passover, from the Hebrews being passed over.

This holiday symbolizes freedom and liberation, a time to celebrate our freedom from slavery. The first and second nights we hold seders, which means order. It is a systematically constructed meal that recounts the Exodus from Egypt. We read from a book called the Haggadah, which translates "to tell." We eat traditional food such as matzah and horseradish. Usually guests to the meal include family members and close friends.

For me, this holiday brings me back to reality. It gives me a chance to reflect on all I have and to be able to appreciate what I have with pride in what my ancestors went through and how they got their freedom. If I lived back then, would I be strong enough to do that? Would I allow a person to rule my life such as Pharaoh did? Would I revolt?

Another tradition associated with Passover is the cleaning of Jewish homes of chametz. Chametz is a combination of flour and water that is able to rise (such as bread, pasta or rice). We are not allowed to have such foods on Passover because as the Hebrews were escaping slavery, they did not have enough time to allow their bread to rise. To symbolize this experience, we eat matzah, a cracker–like bread that is flat and dry. We are put through the hardship of experiencing what our ancestors had to go through.

When it comes to observing this holiday, I personally am very strict. Many people do not fully keep Passover due to the fact that it is the 90s. While I think this modernization is fine, I tend to feel that following the rules of this time are important because they allow me to try and understand the journey undertaken by my ancestors. I am probably the only 21–year–old who enjoys the seder and loves re–enacting the story.

The Jews have been persecuted many times throughout history, yet somehow seem to continually overcome prejudicial treatment while becoming a stronger nation. The story of the Exodus is no different. For many years, Jews were kept in bondage working for Pharaoh. After Pharaoh ordered the murder of all Jewish baby males, Moses, a first born son, was given up by his mother so he would be spared. One of Pharaoh's wives found him and decided to raise him as her own. Moses was a teenager when he found out that he was Jewish. He went to the man he thought was his father and asked him to free his people. When the Hebrews realized he was one of them, they listened and followed him.

At this point in history, it is an amazing occurrence. If you think about it. The Hebrews are persecuted for years and really want to revolt. However, when one of those in power finds out he should be one of the slaves, the revolution finally occurs.

Think about that shift for a minute. What would you do? Would you keep it a secret, knowing you are supposed to royalty? Or would you help fight for the rights of your true people?

When Moses chose to stand up for himself and for his people, he changed the course of history. Those of us who are Jewish might still be in slavery.

If you think of all this one man did to help save the Jewish people, along with all the accomplishments of the Jews to save themselves, it is a miracle we are still here today. This holiday is such a deep–rooted, heart–wrenching time for me. I remember what my ancestors had to live through. I try to imagine myself as a slave, even as Miriam, Moses's sister. I try to think how I would have acted when I found out the truth about the Pharaoh's son. What would you have done?

More than just a religion

The first time I had to confront my Jewishness was when the secretary at my high school asked if Yom Kippur was a tropical disease.

I was perplexed. All of a sudden, my religion turned into something I had to justify, which also differentiated me from the rest of my peers.

Chanukah became a pathetic comparison of Christmas, and Passover turned out to be a week in which I got to eat my dry matzah across from my cheeseburger–eating friends.

I also had the "privileges" of having to ask the janitor politely to wipe off the occasional swastika from the bathroom door and try to answer many questions I didn't know the answers to.

Sadly, such is the reality for many young Jews in America. Being Jewish entails representing a religion they can't quite call their own.

Although I have always been proud to be Jewish, my curiosity about the deeper meaning of the religion was dying until recently, when I attended a Judaism and Social Justice Conference in New York City.

The conference, sponsored by Lights In Action, a nation– wide student organization, provided me with new insights into what being Jewish really meant.

People in the conference came from across the country and from different Jewish backgrounds, but they all shared one quality: a passion to learn more about and contribute to the religion.

Natty Yagudin

One of the most memorable experiences was speaking to a religious woman about Jewish sexual practices. Frustrated by the male–oriented tradition, I started expressing my anger at the unnecessary conservatism of Judaism.

To my surprise, the woman didn't turn away or ignore my questions. Instead, she tried to answer them and opened a dialogue with me about the meaning of Jewish laws. I was stunned. Never before had any religious person been willing to talk to me about why, exactly, they are religious.

I did not come back from the conference with answers. In fact, I came back with many more questions than I initially had.

In a sense, however, I felt a tremendous relief. More than anything, I got the message that it's okay to ask any question I want without feeling inadequate.

As Richard Joel, the Hillel International President, said in a visit to UMass last week, many Jews feel as though the only class they are failing is their Jewishness. However, as long as you keep asking, you can't fail.

Redemption

What is "redemption," or "freedom?" Are these terms referring only to the "I can do whatever I want" statement spouted from the mouth of any young child, or is there something deeper at play? This week we are celebrating the Jewish holiday of Pesach (Passover), which commemorates the Jewish exodus from Egypt and begins Wednesday night. On the surface, the story simply describes a series of calamities inflicted on the Egyptians by God, who then redeem the Jews and eventually leads them through the sea of reeds to Mount Sinai. A singular event in history, yet this is where the truth begins, not where it ends. Through the text we can find timeless insights, the type which are as meaningful now as they were 3000 years ago (when the event occurred).

Hayyim Rothman

There are two types of redemption, physical and spiritual. Physical is self–evident, but spiritual needs some explanation. From time to time the phrase "slave mentality" is thrown about. What it is, essentially, is a state of mind so conditioned to a particular state that it cannot even comprehend a situation existing outside of that limited world view. To redeem an individual spiritually can be likened to breaking his or her shell of "slave mentality" and opening the way for that person to grow and develop based on what they are, not what they are accustomed to being. Additionally, to physically redeem one who is still mentally enslaved is a fruitless endeavor; he or she will live inwardly in the same manner as before, despite his or her new surroundings.

In this situation Moses found the Jewish people enslaved both mentally and physically. Had God then led them out, in the desert they would have remained slaves to Egypt just as they were slaves in Egypt. Rather, in the midst of the plagues (physical redemption), each Jew was commanded either to take part in the sacrifice of a ram, eat it and spread its blood on his doorposts. The ram represented an important diety of Egypt to the Egyptians, who venerated the animal as a means of paying homage to that particular diety. The public sacrifice of these animals constituted a rejection of that which was most sacred, most essential to Egyptian society and thereby a means of becoming free of it in a true, complete sense.

Yet the question remains, "Why be redeemed?" or rather, "What, beyond the obvious (physical slavery and the slave mentality) was it that rendered Egypt so contemptible, and necessitated a Jewish redemption?" The word Mitzrayim (Egypt) in Hebrew means to limit. Expanding on this idea, it means attempting to constrict Godliness/truth, limiting it in a way that leaves room for something else (anything that runs contrary to the truth), thus concealing the absolute reality. According to rabbinic tradition, the Egyptian civilization was one of sensualism. Sexuality was abused, physical gratification reigned supreme and beautification of the body and of the physical surroundings were of supreme importance. Even the Egyptian afterlife was believed to be a sensual, near physical experience for which one needed to take gold to the grave and to build pyramids at great cost to human life. This concept can be characterized as "beauty/happiness is truth." Yet we all know that beauty is not always truth (take a look at Hollywood set designs, realistic but totally fake), and neither is happiness (observe a heroin junkie's first shot of the day). Only Truth is true, it is not always happy or beautiful, but there is always joy in it because it is real. Happiness or beauty that is not a result of truth is neither happy not beautiful. it is but a cheap facsimile, a shadow; an idol which imitates but never actually becomes what it is meant to represent. Ignoring this fact leads both to a nullification of true spirituality (the worship of self) and also to a principle–based justification of human suffering (slavery, etc.) in the name of a greater social pleasure, both of which Egypt was guilty. On Pesach we leave Mitzrayim as our ancestors did, shedding these concealments to reveal authentic truth, thereby authentic happiness and authentic beauty.

Our society gives us watered–down spirituality via fad dish New Age paperbacks and magazines, we are led to believe that if the body is beautiful the heart is happy. we are conditioned into ambivalence regarding crimes against humanity by daily barrages of violence aimed at our entertainment. These unfortunate products of the modern world and others constitute our Mitzrayim. They conceal the truth, and rather than being truly happy we become sedated, allowing ourselves to believe that this stupor is joy, truth. We all too often become lost in the slave mentality mentioned above, slave to the media's presentation of what we are and should be, slave even to our own presentation because we refuse to grow and develop. Amidst this situation, it is difficult to see or imagine something different or better, often even our concept of "better" is shaped by the shackles that hold us down, rather than by objective truth. Therefore we have Pesach to tear away the shades before our eyes; we are walking out into the desert, all of us to be alone with God, to meet "face to face" with the Absolute. It is at this time that we have the power to let go of all the artificial ideals imposed upon us by our society, even to shed what we once thought we were in order to become what we really are; to lead and be led out of Egypt "with an open hand and an outstretched arm," to the promised land, to truth, to life.

On this note I leave you, with blessings for a meaningful, kosher and joyous Pesach. For information on seders in the area, contact Rabbi Adelman at the Chabad House at 30 North Hadley Rd. or 549–8749. L'Shana Habah B'Yerushalayim (next year in Jerusalem.

Art exhibits which reflect people and aspects of one's own community are special events. They have an almost magical way of opening one's eyes to the intricacies of how separate lives mesh and support one another. The University of Massachusetts exhibit titled, Women's Work, at the Student Union Visual and Performing Arts Space, is a unique perspective on inspiring women of the Pioneer Valley.

The show is a student directed project by the Social Thought and Political Economy Department of the UMass. It features the amateur photography of eight UMass students each with a certain point of view on how some women have significantly defined themselves within this community.

According to the exhibit's preface, "Women's Work is an application of the arts as a political and conscious–ness raising vehicle. The project explores ways in which amateur photography can be used to encourage conversation and challenge pre–veiling discourses of work, gender, and sex."

But, the photographs are more than simply social and political statements. They are portraits of momentous women as pillars of strength in the structure of society. Each photo is accompanied by quotes and a summary of some of the woman's many accomplishments. The focus of the exhibit is not so much on the art but on these women as examples of strength, courage, and ingenuity. The interaction of the show with a viewer is on a personal level; like learning something new about a neighbor or receiving a smile from someone you just met.

The exhibit is only running through March 31, so don't miss out on the opportunity to experience the photography of Women's Work.

No. 9 women's water polo cruises

By Lawrence Redford
Collegian Staff

This past weekend the No. 9 University of Massachusetts women's water polo team got back in the win column with five matches on the schedule. UMass had a match against Harvard on Friday in Boston. The remainder of the games came via the Collegiate Water Polo Association, (CWPA) New England Division tournament in Providence, RI.

Friday evening the Minutewomen got in the water to take on the Crimson of Harvard. UMass established themselves immediately, scoring three goals in the opening period while shutting Harvard out. By the game's end, the Minutewomen walked away with a convincing 7–1 victory. All–American Katie Grogan lead the team scoring three goals.

Saturday afternoon the women began the CWPA (regular season) tourney with Wesleyan and Dartmouth then had a nightcap with Mount Holyoke. On Sunday the Minutewomen took on Yale, to close the event.

In the opening match against Weselyan, the Minutewomen continued their season–long trend of getting out to an early start when they took a 7–0 lead in the first quarter. When the match had concluded, the Minutewomen had been victorious by the score 13–3. Freshman standout Anne Dettloff lead the Minutewomen with three goals.

Against the Big Green the Minutewomen coasted to an easy 13–0 win, scoring nine goals in the first two periods. Jacqui Goodhue tallied a hat trick, leading UMass to the victory. Neighboring Mount Holyoke proved to be the closest game of the weekend. The final score was 8–2, with UMass taking a 6–0 lead out of the first period. Again, freshmen phenoms Anne Deatloff and Alexa Olsen netted two goals each, leading UMass to victory.

The Minutewomen ended the weekend on Sunday with a match against Yale. This was another match in which UMass scored 13 goals, five coming in the opening period. The final score was 13–3 UMass, with Sarah Newell taking her turn as the scoring leader, posting a hat trick of her own.

When the weekend was over the Minutewomen had improved to 18–4 overall and 9–0 in CWPA competition.

UM men's tennis falls to Colgate but downs St. Bonaventure, 7–0

By Seth Szilagyi and James Piehl
Collegian Staff

Mixed feelings can describe the Massachusetts men's tennis team's reaction to this past weekends' results versus Colgate and St. Bonaventure. UMass lost to Colgate 4–3, in a tight match–up but then rebounded to beat the Bonnies 7–0.

"Going into the match with Colgate, I thought there was no chance of competing. But it turns out we should have beaten them," said coach Judy Dixon.

On Friday, the Minutemen learned they would lose No. 6 player Parsa Samii for the rest of the season with a broken thumb. This will be the second big loss for UMass, as they previously lost Fabian Rabanal to a broken sacrum.

"It's been a bad luck season and in tennis with a twelve– man squad, the losses have a greater impact," said Coach Dixon.

The No. 1 doubles team of Rob Manchester and Steve Prisco were ahead 4–1, but ended up losing the match 8–6, which proved costly as they dropped the doubles point.

Another tough loss came at the No. 3 singles position, as the normally consistent Manchester went down to Zack Kaplan in three sets, 6–3, 4–6, 6–3.

"Rob is usually a match where I can mail it in. I can just count on it. But I took it for granted and he took it for granted," said Coach Dixon.

No. 1 singles man, Steve Prisco, came out of his slump with a solid win over B.J. Tucker, 6–4, 7–6 (7–4) and No. 5 Bo Navarro overcame a first set loss to win his match, 6–7, 6–3, 6–3.

"Prisco played excellent, beautiful tennis and Bo is definitely the surprise of the season. He has been working out and running everyday. It really shows in his foot work and his overall play," said Coach Dixon of the players.

The injuries have been a blessing in disguise. Bill Greener, the sophomore walk–on who normally at the No. 12 position, picked up another victory at the No. 6 position, defeating I.P. Johnson, 6–2, 6–4.

"It's amazing that he's playing and it's amazing that he's winning. We are an even deeper team now, with Bill playing so well," said Coach Dixon.

The St. Bonaventure match was not as big a test, as the Minutemen overpowered the Bonnies.

The win moves UMass to 3–0 in the Atlantic 10, putting the team in good position with three more matches to go.

concerned," Dietz said. "But the water level came up about eight feet because of the melting snow. Half of our markers were underwater."

As a result of the excess water flowing into the river, the current was moving much faster than usual, making it difficult for Dietz to assess the performance of his team, which had practiced along a much calmer Connecticut River the previous week.

"The water was moving very fast," the fourth–year coach said. "I wish we could have a better assessment of our times, but this is an outdoor sport and we realize things like that can happen."

Although unpleased by the weather, Dietz was extremely proud of the effort of both his varsity and novice teams. The varsity eight–boat blew away its competition with an impressive time of 5:51, while the first two novice rowed solidly en route to a pair of first–place finishes. The freshman boat also won its race by a dominating 11–second margin.

"All of our teams looked very strong," said Dietz, a three– time Olympic participant and two–time Olympic coach. "We won all our races."

In addition to the river conditions, the amount of crowd support was much to the surprise of Dietz, who was extremely happy to see approximately 250–300 fans cheering along the banks of the river during the Minutewomen's first varsity home race in nearly three seasons.

"The most amazing thing about the entire event had to have been the spectators," he said. "It was great to see that kind of support."

Although projected as the fifth best team in the country in the preseason coaches poll, UMass will travel to Charlottesville, Va. this weekend as possible underdogs to the nationally acclaimed Virginia Cavaliers. Dietz anticipates this race to be one of the most difficult tests of the Minutewomen's 1998 campaign.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — There's no use in worrying about what ails you today if you're not going to take positive steps toward solving the problem. Activate yourself!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — It's up to you to get things going today. Others may know that something is necessary, and some may know exactly what is going on, but the first step must be yours.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — What begins as something unimportant is likely to develop quickly into something pivotal and worth a great deal of more time and effort.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You're on a mission, and it's important that you keep things in perspective the more involved you get. Don't lose control of the situation.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — No one will be able to outthink you at any moment today, but you mustn't let yourself become overconfident. Keep looking at things in a humble way.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may feel as though something is "slipping away" from you today, and as you try, you might realize that you cannot hold on. Try letting go for a while.

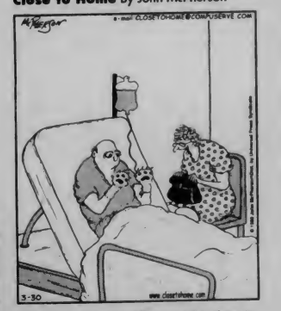
LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Don't panic over a late start today. You'll have the chance to catch up with yourself and others, and lead the pack into the home stretch.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Things in all arenas aren't likely to go unnoticed today, particularly if you do them. You have a way of attracting the right kind of attention.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You'll have the time to assess your situation this week, and to rethink what you're doing at any given moment. Look at yourself honestly today.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Hard work is sure to yield results today, but you may be surprised to find out that peripheral affairs are developing in an unexpected way.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — The unavoidable is best encountered head-on today. If you try to skirt the issue, you're sure to make things more difficult for yourself.



PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Do things one-step at a time today and you'll enjoy very positive results. Resist the temptation to do "double duty" at this time.

Men's gym win ECAC championship

UM's LaVallee and Pryor place first and second in the all–around title

Next stop, Champagne, Illinois.

History was made on Friday as the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team walked away as ECAC champion for the first time ever, ending Temple University's nine year run. UMass, which scored a season–high 227.425, automatically qualifies for the NCAA East Regional at the University of Illinois on April 10. Army placed second with 216.800, and was followed in the top five by William and Mary (216.675), Temple (214.775), and Navy (213.500).

"This was a great day," said coach Roy Johnson. "It has been a long time coming. This group of guys is just great! Everyone has been feeling good about their routines and we just put it all together."

Among the top finishers of the meet were Olympic hopeful Jeff LaVallee and senior captain Stephen Pryor; two Minutemen who are quintessential to this talented team.

LaVallee captured the all–around title with a score of 58.250, taking the top spots on the floor exercise (9.700), still rings (9.775), vault (9.700), parallel bars (9.600) and an all–time school record on high bar (9.900). His impressive scores on each of the six events qualified him for the individual event finals on Saturday afternoon.

"LaVallee has been consistent for us all year on each of the events," Johnson said. "He's in a class by himself on high bar. Pryor had his best performances of the year on Friday, showing his most improvement on p–bars."

Stephen Pryor contributed to his team placing second in the all–around with a 56.675 and qualifying for the event finals on the pommel horse (9.625), still rings (9.450), vault (9.500) and parallel bars (9.400). Senior Dan Young earned a spot in the event finals with a stellar performance on floor (9.600) and p–bars (9.30), while tumbling powerhouse sophomore Bryan McNulty qualified with a 9.500 on the event.

Three more members of the sophomore class took the spotlight Friday night as Mike Alexander finished sixth overall on vault (9.300), while Andy Leis stunned the audience with a spectacular dismount on high bar, helping him earn an event final–qualifying 9.400 on the event. J.J. Hershey also earned a spot at Saturday's competition with a powerful 9.400 on the still rings, while placing fourth overall on high bar (9.350).

After it received the ECAC Champion Cup on Friday, the Minutemen kept their momentum going and had many strong finishes in the event finals the following day.

To no surprise, LaVallee won three individual event titles, while Lieberman was handed the high bar crown. LaVallee won the floor exercise (9.700), the still rings (9.775) and the parallel bars (9.450), while taking the silver on the pommel horse (9.725). Lieberman led the UMass sweep on the high bar, scoring a 9.775, while finishing third on the vault with a 9.400.

"[Lieberman's] releases are really tricky," Johnson said "but he really knows his gymnastics and he rose to the occasion. He's had the potential to win since he was a freshman, and it was great to see him take first place."

Lieberman was ECAC floor champion in 1997 and has made the ECAC event finals on high bar during each of his four years here at UMass, yet the high bar gold medal always slipped his grasp.

"I've always made it to finals, but have never won the championship," Lieberman said. "It felt great to win this year. I had a little trouble on floor, but I think I redeemed myself on high bar. I can't be any happier."

Many other Minutemen stood by Lieberman and made their impressions in the overall standings. McNulty took an impressive second place finish on the floor exercise (9.600), while Leis took second (9.650) and Hershey took third (9.400) on the high bar.

Like LaVallee, Pryor cleaned house on Saturday, as he snagged the second place spot on the parallel bars (9.400), fourth on the vault (9.300), fifth on the still rings (9.150) and sixth on the pommel horse (9.550).

Senior Dan Young finished fifth on the floor exercise (9.150) and seventh on the parallel bars (9.750). Alexander, who was recently named ECAC Rookie of the Week, took fifth on the vault (9.150).

The Minutemen lit up the William D. Mullins Center this weekend, and will travel to Champagne, Illinois on April 10 to make its first time appearance at the NCAA East Regional in UMass history.

Men's lax looks to continue reign over Boston College

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will look to snap a two–game losing skid against an opponent they have never fallen to, when they host Boston College today at Garber Field, with a 3 p.m. face–off (WMUA 91.1 FM).

Remarkably, the Minutemen have disposed of their Bay State foes in 25 consecutive meetings, but Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella does not point to that history as a likely determining factor in today's match–up.

"We're not concerned about [the streak] at all," Cannella said. "Our players don't even know about it, because what it comes down to is that none of that stuff really matters on the field."

Whether or not the players will be concerned with the past, they will be very anxious to end their slide, before this season gets away from them.

UMass entered Saturday's game against Hofstra ranked No. 20 in the nation, but the loss on Long Island dropped the squad to 2–3 on the year, and likely carned negative connotations concerning the ratings as well.

"The team is coming off one of their best performances of the spring," said Cannella referring to the second half on Saturday. "It's really up to them now to build off of that, hopefully they bottled up that feeling from that great half of play."

The Minutemen were trailing 5–2 at the break against the Flying Dutchmen, but they responded in the second frame with five goals before valiantly succumbing 8–7.

The solid performance from several members of the younger contingent for the Minutemen squad was particularly encouraging to Cannella.

"It was good to see Marc Morley get on the board again with a couple of goals and Keith Gabrielli probably had his best collegiate game so far," Cannella said.

On defense, Justin Koenigsberger rebounded from Virginia really well for us, as did Eric Sopracasa, but we will need to get everyone involved and contributing now to get back on track."

The top five scorers for UMass are all sophomores, a testament to how well the lowerclassmen have contributed early on.

Attackman Rich Kunkel currently leads the troops with 12 goals and four assists, followed by attackman John Madigan, who has posted seven goals and five assists.

Kevin Dell ranks third in scoring with three goals and seven assists and is coming off a stellar effort against Hofstra in which he tallied a goal and two assists.

Gabrielli and Mike McKeefrey round out the top five with seven and six points, respectively.

Despite the Eagles horrid results against UMass over the years and their 1–3 start this year, Cannella expects a competitive contest and warns that his defense better be ready for another fast–paced attack.

"B.C. will look to push the ball up the field constantly," Cannella said. "They are a run–and–gun team that will give us another challenge to respond to."

UMass baseball looking for a second win

Hoping to end the early season jitters, the Massachusetts baseball team faces the Huskies of Connecticut today in Storrs, Connecticut.

UMass played Yale in a double–header on Saturday, winning both and finally rising above the equator at 8–7.

JOE D. SAVITCH / COLLEGIAN

UMass catcher Brian Samela and the baseball team travel to Storrs, Connecticut to face the Big East Huskies today.

The offense has been well distributed throughout the lineup. Senior left fielder Aaron Braunstein has powered his way to a .351 batting average while knocking in a team– leading 17 runs to go along with two home runs and two triples. Bryan Mazzaferro has tallied 15 RBI and is tied with Braunstein for the team lead in hits with 20.

Freshman Scott Anderson has been a pleasant surprise at the plate for UMass. Batting .367 with one round–tripper, Anderson has also knocked in 12 runs on 18 hits.

UMass coach Mike Stone has allowed all of the pitchers an opportunity to prove themselves on the mound. David Loonie (2–1) has pitched 19.2 innings, allowing 22 hits and eight earned runs. Jesse Santos has come in on relief, tossing 9.1 innings and allowing four earned runs on six hits. The freshman has been stingy on the mound, letting his opposing batter hit just a team–best .176. Sophomore Craig Szado has registered the second–most innings on the staff (21.1), sporting a 5.00 ERA and striking out a team–leading 24 batters.

UConn (11–9, 1–3 Big East) has earned all but one win outside the conference. In their most recent action, the Huskies

Minutewomen spirits were high last week before their first home race in three years, but despite a convincing victory over the Wildcats and the Eagles, the unusually warm weather dealt a serious blow to UMass.

UConn upsets Duke; first National Championship for Calhoun, Huskies

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) — Connecticut spoiled the Duke Invitational.

The Huskies beat top-ranked Duke, the team no one thought could be beaten in this NCAA tournament, for their first national championship in their first Final Four appearance.

The 77-74 victory last night ended Duke's 32-game winning streak and kept the Blue Devils from an NCAA record for wins in a season.

Richard Hamilton led third-ranked Connecticut (34-2) with 27 points, but it was some tremendous team defense and a big shot and free throws by Khalid El-Amin that won it all.

Trajan Langdon led Duke (37-2) with 25 points, but Duke's last two possessions ended with him making turnovers. And so the Blue Devils fell short of what everyone had expected — another title.

These were the only two teams to hold the No. 1 ranking this season and they played a final game worthy of the two best.

Connecticut was able to keep the game at a pace it liked even though most everyone thought the Huskies should try to slow the tempo. The quick pace made for what seemed like constant lead changes, the last coming with 3:50 to play when Hamilton's free throws gave the Huskies a 70-68 lead.

He hit a 3-pointer 21 seconds later for a five-point lead and suddenly Duke was playing a role it had very little experience at this season — the chaser.

William Avery's free throws with 54 seconds left got the Blue Devils within 75-74. El-Amin, whose driving basket had given Connecticut the 75-72 lead, missed on a drive with 24 seconds left and Duke had life.

The crowd of 41,340 at Tropicana Field, the court where Duke's season ended a year ago, was roaring as the Blue Devils went for the final shot without calling a timeout.

Langdon, the fifth-year senior who made the Final Four in his last chance, tried to get by Ricky Moore, one of the game's best defenders. Langdon spun but Moore was there. Langdon took an extra step and was called for traveling with 5.4 seconds to go.

El-Amin made two free throws with 5.2 seconds left to get the lead back to 3, and Langdon's last chance at tying the game ended when he fell near the 3-point line and lost control of the ball.

With that, Connecticut charged the court and had the title everyone thought Duke would claim.

It was Duke's eighth Final Four under Mike Krzyzewski, who was trying to become the fourth coach to win a third national championship.

It was Connecticut's first and Jim Calhoun, labeled one of the best coaches never to reach a Final Four, finally did, and left the court with a national title in his 27th season, the last 13 at Connecticut.

Duke finishes tied with the 1986 Duke team and UNLV in 1987 with 37 victories. The loss also gives Duke a 2-6 record in national championship games, the titles coming in 1991 and 1992.

This title was the first for the Big East since Villanova pulled off another huge upset in 1985, beating Georgetown.

A jumper by Hamilton gave the Huskies a 65-59 lead with 8:57 left. Elton Brand, the national player of the year who finished with 15 points and 13 rebounds, got Duke right back in it.

Brand blocked a shot by Hamilton then went down and scored on a fast break. He then stole the ball from Edmund Saunders 30 feet from the basket, but missed the free throw when he was fouled. After a basket by Chris Carrawell brought the Blue Devils within 65-63, Brand blocked a 3-point attempt by El-Amin and Langdon made one of two free throws on that possession to make it 65-64.

Hamilton, a first-team All-American who was 10-for-22 from the field and had seven rebounds, finished as the tournament's leading scorer with 145 points in the six games, a 24.1 average. He was the tournament's Most Outstanding Player.

Moore scored all 13 of his points in the first half and El-Amin had 12.

Langdon was 7-for-15 from the field, including 5-for-10 from 3-point range, and Avery had 11 points and five assists.

Duke's only other loss was by one point to Cincinnati in November and only four times did a team come within 10 points of the Blue Devils, who led the nation in scoring (92.3) and margin of victory (25.4).

Krzyzewski, who will have hip replacement surgery next week, is second on the NCAA tournament career victory list with 49.

Area governors selected in newest SGA elections

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The results from the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) elections for area governors, lieutenant governors, secretaries and treasurers are in, Jeremy Rouille, the chancellor of elections, was happy with the end results.

"I was happy with the way everyone behaved, they watched each other. I was happy considering how elections in the past have been," said Rouille.

The winners for Commuter Area are as follows: Melina Arroyo for governor; Casey Kane for lieutenant governor; Lisa Metcalf for secretary; and Emily Trask won treasurer.

Representing the Orchard Hill Residential Area: Jefferson Smith won for governor; John Sheehan won for lieutenant governor; Jessica Jeffrey won for secretary; and Jeffrey Perlman won for treasurer.

In the Central Residential Area: George Gilmer won for governor; Juliet Okafor won for lieutenant; Rosaline Vacilmond won for secretary; and Starr Mosley won for treasurer.

The winners for the Southwest Residential Area are Jonathan Shea for governor and Luke Drocher for lieutenant governor. There was a two–way tie between Jim Eltringham and Brendan O'Brian for secretary, and Howard Mak won for treasurer.

In the Sylvan Residential Area: James Chilaka won the governor's seat; Jim Preston won the lieutenant governor position; Mike Silva won for secretary; and Dave Horton won for treasurer.

In the Northeast Residential Area there were a number of ties. In the governor's race, Hamilton Rodriguez won. For lieutenant governor Yako Ho, Derrick Casilli, Karra DeVellis, Alina Ho, Monique Holmes, MyMy Tran, Nat Olken and Parag Shah all won. For secretary there was a five–way tie. Parag Shah, Carol King, Thoa Tran, Erin Sadlier and Karra DeVillis all won for secretary. There always was also a tie for treasurer. Brian Florida, Rachael Mondall, and Parog Shouh all were winners for treasurer.

The ties will be broken at this week's SGA meeting. The senate will vote on the winners and break the ties.

The SGA is also accepting applications for cabinet positions. President–elect Jeffrey Howe would like to see more become involved with the SGA. Cabinet positions can be filled by any student at the University.

"I am hoping for a large number of application and participation from groups on campus that haven't been traditionally involved," said Howe.

There are open positions for secretary of finance, registry, University policy, administrative affairs and public relations.

UM student voting increases

Schiffer retains seat and Seppala is voted in during Amherst elections

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Incumbent Eva Schiffer will be keeping her Select Board seat warm and Carl Seppala will be heating his up after elections last night, but if students had their way the outcome would have been different.

Schiffer and Seppala won the three–year positions by large margins with 1,309 and 1,181 votes respectively, from the 12 precincts.

Despite being a front–runner during campaigning, Schiffer said she appreciated the significance of the victory and said there was a lot of work to be done.

"You can't take anything for granted," Schiffer said. "We're working very hard [to prepare for Town Meeting]."

Seppala said being the new kid on the block means playing catch–up on work preparing for Town Meeting.

"I have about a month to catch up on everything. [It's] a lot of work. I have to take a fifth of the articles," Seppala said of the numerous articles the five Select Board members divide up to bring to Town Meeting in April.

Marjorie R. Crossman came in third with 555 votes. Paul DiBenedetto followed with 265 votes and Prudencio Gomez Sr. trailed with 253.

But if students had been the only voters Gomez would have won by a landslide.

Gomez received over twice the number of votes that Schiffer or Seppala tallied from student precincts. Of the 25 ballots cast by students, out of about 2,000 who were registered to vote in the two precincts in Southwest, 13 voted for Gomez, while six voted for Schiffer. Seppala garnered four votes and Crossman received two. DiBenedetto did not receive any votes.

Those working the student polling places said student– voter turnout was not expected to be high.

"We are excited," said Jennifer Casasanto, a polling station worker, of the larger–than–expected turn out.

Casasanto said the turnout was expected to be low because no students were running in the election and local elections draw fewer voters anyway.

Lower student–voter turnout in the past at the polling places put the precincts in jeopardy of being dropped. But last night's turnout gave the polling station workers hope the locations would remain.

"We're going to be meeting with the Select Board on this," said David Hammer a representative from Commuter Services, adding that the meetings might be this summer. "We did meet the percentage of an improvement [in] voter numbers needed to keep the polling places," Hammer said.

Student–voter turnout might have been increased by the efforts of one student group publicizing the elections and their support of two candidates.

The Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) backed Seppala and Gomez and to help their cause sent out a voice mail message last night to all the students who were eligible to vote in the election.

"Carl [Seppala] and Pruddy [Gomez] were definitely leaning in our direction... just from conversations with them," said Terry Franklin, spokesperson for the CRC. I knew the two women were against us."

In the only other contested race, which was for the Housing Authority, Peter Jessop won the five–year position with 542 votes defeating Cheryl Duncan, who had 471 votes.

NATO rejects proposal as fighting continues

By George John
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Yugoslav leader Slobodan Milosevic insisted yesterday that NATO attacks stop before he moves toward peace, declaring his forces ready to fight "to the very end." NATO answered with new resolve to wreck his military with a relentless air assault.

More than six hours of talks with Russia's prime minister yielded a statement by Milosevic that he was willing to rein in a harsh campaign against ethnic Albanians in Kosovo and resume peace talks if the NATO strikes stopped.

His proposal was rejected by NATO leaders including President Clinton, who warned that atrocities against ethnic Albanians would weaken Serbia's claim to the separatist province and increase NATO's determination to destroy Milosevic's army.

"We will see that his military will be seriously diminished, key military infrastructure destroyed, the prospect for International support for Serbia's claim to Kosovo increasingly jeopardized," Clinton said, adding that the allies "must remain steady and determined."

NATO officials said the number of ethnic Albanians who have fled Kosovo in the last six days has grown to 118,000, and Pec, a city of 100,000 in western Kosovo, has been "almost totally destroyed."

Kosovo Albanians kept up their exodus by foot, car and cart, pouring across the border and overwhelming Albania, one of the world's poorest countries. The cries of babies echoed in the air, and their parents looked exhausted. Many were close to tears. At least eight elderly refugees, exhausted by the journey, died in a hospital yesterday in Kukes, Albania. One woman had deep scratches on her knees, suggesting that she was dragged or crawled at one point during her flee to safety.

Chhim case speckled with controversies

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Two plastic bags and a container of marijuana were lined up along the Superior Court Clerk's desk in front of Judge Judd Carhart's bench yesterday alongside a pipe, a jar with marijuana needs and a triple– beam scale.

The assorted items were handed over by University of Massachusetts Detective Brian Narkewicz as evidence collected from the Cashin dormitory room of shooting victim Russell Bishop during day six of the trial of Amherst high school student Sokha Chhim.

Chhim has pled not guilty to charges of assault with intent to murder, assault and battery with a deadly weapon, assault with a deadly weapon, armed robbery and unlawful possession of a firearm.

He has been identified by numerous witnesses this week in connection with the Oct. 30 shooting of former UMass engineering student Bishop. However, defense attorney Joseph Franco has questioned the validity of their identifications, and yesterday challenged the alibi of Retanak Ek, a suspect in the initial stages of the investigation.

After viewing photographic arrays shortly after the incident, three witnesses, including Bishop, identified Ek and Chhim as the possible shooter.

Ek testified yesterday that he was at the Hampshire Mall with his girlfriend the night of the shooting. He said he arrived at the mall at approximately 7 p.m. and left at 12:30 a.m. During that time he witnessed a fight between two girls and met an acquaintance, Fransisco C. Rivera, at the bus stop outside the mall at approximately 9 p.m., he said.

Narkewicz verified that a fight had taken place in the mall that evening, but Rivera later testified that he had not seen Ek at the bus stop that night.

During cross–examination, Franco suggested that Ek had told police he was at the mall to prevent implicating himself, since police told him he was a suspect and had been identified by at least one witness.

Franco also questioned Ek's motives for testifying against Chhim, his high school friend. Chhim had testified in a 1997 trial against Ek, who was being charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon. Franco suggested that Ek was carrying out a personal vendetta by implicating Chhim as the shooter.

Ek said that was not the case, and that he and Chhim still hung out together after Ek's trial. Ek also said he was initially uncooperative with police because he "did not want to rat on [Chhim]."

But during yesterday's trial, Ek told of an earlier attempt by Chhim to buy marijuana on the UMass campus. On Oct. 25, Ek drove Chhim and another high school student, Thea Som, to the Sylvan Residential Area and waited in his car for 10–15 minutes while Chhim "went to go buy weed," Ek said.

UMass SGA creates new Program Board to help outside programming

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) is finally moving ahead with a Program Board. The idea of a Program Board is to create consistent programming the whole University can enjoy.

According to Sandra Brookley, the secretary of the registry and the author of its constitution, the Program Board will be planning programming anywhere outside the Student Union.

Because structuring of the programming board was a long tedious task this year, the Program Board will not be holding any events independent of other student–run organizations, but it has been working with groups to give them money for programming. According to Brookley, this is the first SGA administration that has been willing to start a Program Board.

"We are allocating funds to any student–run University– affiliated group or Registered Student Organization (RSO). You don't have to be an RSO to get money, all it needs to be is for a campus–wide audience," said Brookley.

According to the Program Board's constitution, which was passed in the Senate three weeks ago, the Board can give up to $2,000 to any group that asks for it. "If they ask for more it goes to the Senate with either a positive or negative recommendation for the Program Board," said Brookley.

Two thousand dollars has been give to the Stonewall Center for an event featuring Ellen DeGeneres. Another $10,000 was given to the SGA for Spring Concert. Central and Orchard Hill Residential Areas were both given $2,000 for spring events. Because of the limited time left in the semester, the Program

Eight vending machines were vandalized over the weekend, University of Massachusetts Police Chief John Luippold said yesterday.

Five vending machines in Tobin Hall, Herter Hall, and Dwight, McNamara and Baker Residence Halls, were broken into between 6:16 and 7:42 a.m. Sunday.

Due to the short time frame in which the five machines were broken into, police believe the incidents are connected, and that the perpetrator(s) broke into the machines while moving across campus.

Two additional vending machines were broken into at the Lederle Graduate Research Center lowrise building. One was reported broken into later that day, at 1:09 p.m., the other the following day, Monday, at 3:30 a.m. Shortly afterward, at 3:49 a.m., the glass was moved from a vending machine in Morrill Science Center IV, but no damage was done to the machine.

Both money and merchandise were stolen from the machines, Luippold said. Police believe fire extinguishers were used in some instances to break the machines' glass fronts.

Group talks admissions

Task Force restructures, forms subcommittees

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts admissions policy was discussed last night at a meeting held by students in the Cape Cod Lounge. More then 100 students gathered there to discuss the action that will be taken next.

The meeting started with changes being made to how the task force was being run. Kiya Stokes, a graduate student who has been active in trying to change the admissions policy, started by saying, "People are not being heard, and things have been done undemocratically, so we're changing our structure to incorporate new voices," said Stokes.

The steering committee has been done away with and new organization strategies have taken its place. According to Stokes, all decisions will be made by the group as a whole.

The Coordinating Committee will now be the core of the Task Force. Their job will be similar to what the steering committee did. They will be working on details, such as the timing of events. Some people included in the coordinating committee are members from the Five Colleges, Asian, Latino, African, and Native Americans (ALANA), as well as low-income white students.

Around the core will be sub-committees, including the education committee, action committee, media committee, negotiating committee, the student liaisons to non-students committee, and a clerical committee.

Some goals the Task Force may adopt were read off. They included race-based affirmative action instituted as a policy and expanded as needed, expansion and improvement of support programs, SATs not used as a criteria for admissions because they have been proven to be racially biased, scholarships and grants expanded, support for single parents, a moratorium, autonomy for student support services, meaning they will not be moved to academic affairs, and to inform the University that improving elementary schools will help.

Stokes finished up the list by saying "Limiting affirmative action policies will be detrimental to the potential future students at the University."

Other then talking about the new structure, there was discussion of future plans. There was a secret vote taken as to what action the task force will take next. According to Resa Singleton, SCERA coordinator, "People are intent with having a big action as soon as possible."

Jeff Belizaire, a sophmore African-American studies major and a interim person on the coordinating committee, said, "People have recognized this a long-term battle. We are taking measures to sustain the Task Force, that's why we made the modifications."

The biggest dream of her life was to come to America to start a family and receive an education. And for University of Massachusetts student Alice Shabunin, that dream came true.

Shabunin made her dream come true when she left Russia in 1991 with her husband and two children to come to the United States. Shabunin also brought with her an ambition to receive a college education.

As an undergraduate student in her 40s with a daughter who is also a UMass undergraduate, Shabunin has become a unique student on the UMass campus.

Born and raised in Russia shortly after the Second World War, Shabunin lived in an economically poor environment and witnessed families coming together to help each other out in difficult times.

"Everyone I knew was poor with three or four children," Shabunin said. "It was a small dirty town, no running water. We used a well."

Shabunin can remember, due to geographical isolation, being denied opportunities for a post-secondary education. With no chance for relocation in another city, she can remember having to help her parents tend to a garden with vegetables, beets, cucumbers and tomatoes, instead of going to school. While her father performed much of the hunting and fishing, she helped at home to sew the family's clothing.

Shabunin attributes learning the hard-working ethics and family values at an early age to her being successful as a student-parent at UMass.

"Because I was taught how to be self-dependent, I can now raise a family on $1,000 a month," Shabunin said. "You might think it's hard for me, but to me it's normal."

At age 14, Shabunin's family moved from Siberia to another village in the south of Russia. After a couple years, Shabunin left her parents to live independently in the city of Rostov.

Living in a new environment, she witnessed things she had never been able to see while in Siberia.

"For the first time in my life, I saw how apples look on a tree," Shabunin said. "I had never seen how they look on a tree."

In Siberia, New Year's Eve was the only holiday they were able to celebrate, so once a year Shabunin received a gift package with an apple, orange and candy in it. She had never fully understood where fruit came from until she came to America.

A few years before the collapse of the Soviet Union, the government granted more religious freedom to citizens. The country was economically unstable as Shabunin remembers, and during such difficult times the people looked to unite.

"We found a religious group by chance and united with them," Shabunin said. "We read the Bible, and it gave us hope to survive."

Then one day, Shabunin said she heard America was inviting religious groups to enter. However, she had to first receive written documented approval by the government to leave Russia. It took almost two years for her papers to be approved, throughout which time she had lost citizenship in her home nation.

"We had to give up our citizenship," Shabunin said. "If we lost our passports and citizenship, it meant losing our jobs and the children's place in education."

Coming to the U.S. was a difficult transformation at first for Shabunin and her family. "It seems to me as if we were crawling [like a child] trying to learn a new life," Shabunin said. "It was all frustration."

It was a real challenge coming to a new nation without knowing English and starting in a new technologically advanced environment.

She explained how a credit card was a notion totally new to her and how blessed her family feels that a sponsor from Springfield helped her husband find a job as a bus driver.

Shabunin spent two years at Springfield Technical Community College learning English before coming to UMass to finish her college degree. It was while she was at Springfield that Shabunin had her third child. She is constantly reminded of how grateful she is to have been provided with an opportunity she wouldn't have had in Russia.

"It's because of America that I have this baby and it's made me happy," Shabunin said. "I'm going through motherhood at such an older age. I thank God everyday for bringing me here. I love America."

Maintaining a 3.4 grade point average, Shabunin feels it has been her enthusiasm more than capability that has allowed her to succeed as a student and raise a family. In her future, Shabunin says she plans on attending graduate school for community health.

Alice Shabunin and her daughter Lily are both students at the University of Massachusetts.

OF ALL THE MAJOR RELIGIOUS LEADERS, ONLY ONE CLAIMED TO BE GOD.

"ANYONE CAN make claims. There have been others who have claimed to be God. I could claim to be God, and you could claim to be God, but the question all of us must answer is, 'What credentials do we bring to substantiate our claim?'

In my case it wouldn't take you five minutes to disprove my claim. It probably wouldn't take too much more to dispose of yours. But when it comes to Jesus of Nazareth, it's not so simple. He had the credentials to back up His claim.

He said, 'Even though you do not believe Me, believe the evidence of the miracles, that you may learn and understand that the Father is in Me, and I in the Father.'

What were Jesus' credentials?

First, His moral character coincided with His claims. Many asylum inmates claim to be celebrities or deities. But their claims are belied by their characters. Not so with Christ. He is unique—as unique as God.

Jesus was sinless. The caliber of His life was such that He was able to challenge His enemies with the question, 'Can any of you prove Me guilty of sin?' He was met by silence, even though He addressed those who would have liked to point out a flaw in His character.

This lack of any sense of moral failure on Jesus' part is astonishing in view of the fact that it is completely contrary to the experience of the saints and mystics in all ages. The closer men and women draw to God, the more overwhelmed they are with their own failure, corruption, and shortcomings.

We read of the temptation of Jesus, but we never hear of a confession of sin on His part. He never asked for forgiveness, though He told His followers to do so.

It is also striking that..."

Low-income graduate students gain support from fasting HC students

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Over 100 Hampshire College students will be fasting today in order to protest the University of Massachusetts' decision to revoke housing vouchers for low-income graduate students.

Eight Hampshire students have been fasting since Monday, and many others will go without food today, to call attention to the plight of financially disadvantaged UMass students. The Hampshire College dining service will donate money to the UMass Parental Survival Campaign for each student who fasts. Tomorrow morning, the students will end their fast by holding a "fast break breakfast."

The fasting has been organized by the Hampshire College "student action" group, which has been involved with the issue since the revocation of the vouchers in January.

The protestors have invited Chancellor David K. Scott to the breakfast, saying, "In the skewed reality that is April Fool's Day, (we) decided there would be no better guest of 'honor' than the very dishonorable Chancellor Scott."

In December, the chancellor approved a $50,000 housing voucher program, which would grant emergency housing funds to low-income graduate students. He revoked the program the next month after several members of the Massachusetts State Legislature showed opposition to the plan, and temporarily blocked approval of the University's contract.

"We feel this issue is very important. Most Hampshire students were shocked that there were people in our own town who weren't always eating," said Helene Bubsy, one of the fasting campaign's organizers. Busby began fasting on Monday.

"We feel that we want to call attention to student parents, because they have to work 20 hours a week, maintain a full class-load, take care of their children, and pay for their own housing," she added. "We can't imagine what it would be like to have to handles those pressures, and not always be able to provide for our own selves."

In January, Scott defended his decision, saying, "While the University cannot resolve the loss of welfare benefits or solve all of the financial emergencies of its students, we are committed to do everything possible to help students stay in school and keep pursuing their educational goals."

He was unavailable for comment on the fasting campaign.

Bubsy is wary of the Chancellor's explanations.

"This is very closely tied to affirmative action, because the administration has been saying that affirmative action will be replaced with a class-based affirmative action, and we feel that the administration's commitment to low-income students is really obvious by the removal to the vouchers," she said.

"When the say that they're going to change affirmative action, we don't buy it."

Board will strictly be allocating funds.

During the summer, however, it will start coming more into its own. "We will purchasing equipment this summer for the RSOs to have access to, we will also start planning our own programs," Brookley said.

The Program Board is not being set up to compete with any group on campus but rather to enhance them. "RSOs provide a service and it would compete with them. We want to support them. We want to be a motivating factor for RSOs and provide a sense of community that right now isn't being provided," said Brookley.

Any student wishing to become involved or having any ideas that would improve the Program Board should contact the SGA.

Murder investigation stems from torture case

ELEPHANT BUTTE, N.M. (AP) — Dozens of FBI agents, including psychological "profilers" specializing in macabre crimes, converged on a trailer home yesterday in an apparent murder investigation that began with a case of sexual torture.

The case began to unfold when a woman escaped from the home wearing only a padlocked metal collar attached to a chain. She said she had been kidnapped and tortured by David Ray and Cindy Hendy. Another woman then came forward and said she, too, had been tortured. And then a friend of Hendy's told a TV station that Ray had killed four to six other victims, mutilated the bodies and dumped them in Elephant Butte Lake, 150 miles south of Albuquerque.

Investigators have been searching the dusty half-acre lot around Ray's double-wide trailer home for several days. They have expanded their search for victims or witnesses into Arizona and Texas and urged anyone else who escaped the couple's torture to come forward. Investigators have refused to say exactly what they are looking for.

Yevgeny Primakov, who met with Milosevic in Belgrade, said upon his arrival later in Bonn, Germany, that the Yugoslav leader was ready for renewed negotiations if NATO stops the bombing.

He said Milosevic wants the talks to include "the interests of all groups in Kosovo" — a reference to the Serb minority in Kosovo, a province in Serbia, the main republic in Yugoslavia. A statement from Milosevic's office read on state-run television said: "To open the space for negotiations, (NATO) aggression on Yugoslavia has to stop immediately."

The Pentagon ordered five B-1 bombers and additional air defense-jamming planes and refueling tankers to Europe for intensified airstrikes.

In Bonn, German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, the current president of the European Union, called Milosevic's offer unacceptable. He specifically rejected the condition that NATO stop its attacks first.

"The signal that the international community expects is the withdrawal of Yugoslav military and paramilitary units from Kosovo," Schroeder said.

In his statement, Milosevic also called for NATO troops in neighboring Macedonia to be removed and a halt in alleged NATO support for the Kosovo Liberation Army, the ethnic Albanian rebels fighting for independence.

"We are ready to defend our country to the very end. It is not the first time Yugoslavia has had to defend itself and its right to sovereignty and territorial integrity and national pride," Milosevic said.

Sidewalk talk

Adam Fine and Noah Uanoff, both of Amherst talk on the sidewalk in Amherst center yesterday afternoon.

■ Chhim

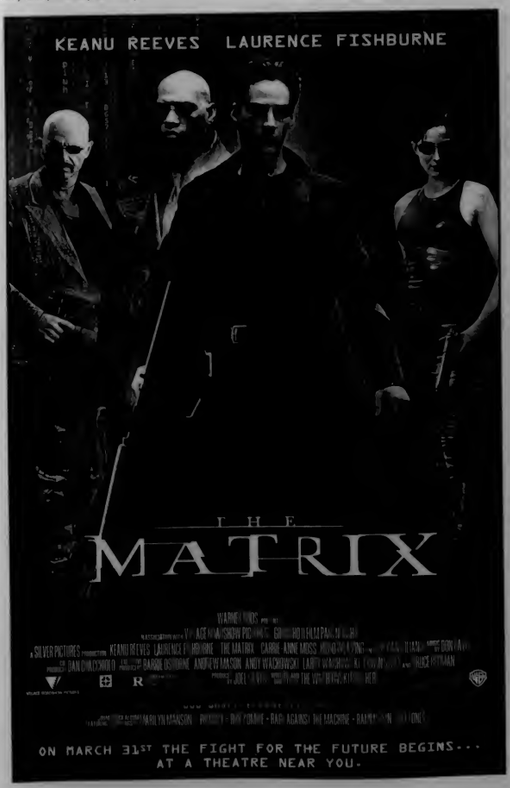
Chhim came back and said, "there was no weed," the person would return Thursday. Ek dropped off Som at a basketball court and drove Chhim back to Amherst.

The group met later at the UMass Student Union to play pool. Ek testified that during the game he saw Chhim drop something: a shiny semi-automatic gun.

The next time Ek heard from Chhim was "at least a couple days later" when Chhim called Ek's house. Ek had earlier told Chhim his mother had been calling looking for him and asked where he was. Chhim said, "Outside." Then Ek asked him what had happened and Chhim replied, "just read the newspapers."



Dana Roy, who accompanied Chhim to Bishop's room the night of the shooting, also testified yesterday morning. Roy said he saw Bishop take two bags of marijuana from his refrigerator, "the most marijuana I've ever seen." He estimated the amount to be approximately one pound.

He then saw Chhim pull back the slide of his gun and shoot Bishop, Roy said. The two fled the building, and left running in different directions. Roy said he ran through the woods toward Pulton Village and took a PVTA (Pioneer Valley Transit Authority) bus home.

However, Stephen Beaurgard, who drove the pair to UMass, testified that he drove both Chhim and Ek home. They got into the car in a normal fashion, Beauregard said, and he didn't see any marijuana.

Two additional high school students, Angel Burgos and and Robert Tarp, also testified yesterday morning. They confirmed that they had been in Watson Farms Field with Roy when Chhim approached Roy about going to UMass to buy marijuana.

Witness testimony ended yesterday afternoon at 3 p.m., and the trial will conclude today. Franco and prosecutor David Ross will present closing arguments at 9 a.m., and jury deliberation will follow.

Refuse to schmooze

How many times have I told myself, "Go to your professor and talk to him after class. Tell him you studied plate tectonics over the summer and enjoy reading Tolstoy on the weekends. Tell him you weren't scared off by the syllabus on the first day, but in fact, you are looking forward to jumping in head first, excited for the challenges that await!"

But no, in reality I'm lucky if I can make eye-contact or say, "bye" after picking up my test. I'm not terribly shy, but I become paralyzed when it comes to the art of shmoozing. Anyone with a suit on or shiny shoes makes my heart pump triple time. Not because I'm in love, but because I know it's inevitable I will say something moronic. Well, come to think of it that happens when I'm in love, too. Maybe I'm just in love every-time I meet a "Big Person."

Julie Fialkow

"Hi, Mr. Smith. I am having trouble with the fax machine today. Maybe I should fix it myself. You're probably busy. You do a lot here. I had a nice bologna sandwhich for lunch today. If you could be a flower, what kind of flower would you be?" "Mr. Smith," as I like to call "the man," thinks I'm a fool.

I'm looking for a job now, or ahem, a career. I must learn how to network. I have to use everyone I know for who they know, and how they can help me. Sometimes I am especially nice to bank tellers who give out lollipops, but I don't think that will get me anywhere but to the dentist.

This sounds quite condescending but I don't know a lot of men's men, women's women, movers or shakers. I know one kid that spends his days listening to UB40 and drinking Surge; doubt he'll help me find a job.

My roomate Eric enjoys putting cats down his pants; my other roomate Jen only eats Little Debbie holiday-themed snackcakes. I don't think they have any leads.

Okay, I'm not searching hard enough... I must know some really powerful players in the publishing field that will give me a book deal. I might not write like Jackie Collins, but I do know about the ol' otamatopoeia, far hotter than ripped bodices and rippling muscles.

My best friend's little sister was on Teen Jeopardy. Maybe she could connect me to Alex Trebek. We could have some martinis and he could hire me as his jeapordy fly–girl. I'd clap and point whenever a contestant got the right answer: "What is a Hungarian Rhinoceros?"

After I got fired from that job (because of my moral convictions, I refuse to wear hot pants that say leapordy on my butt.) I realize that my dad taught last year's Miss America, Kate Shindle, in fifth grade. Maybe I could be a Miss America assistant. Rub vaseline on her teeth and keep her out of harm's way, readjust her sash and crown, and make sure she says darn instead of damn.

No, I don't have the strength to constantly be in the shadow of such greatness. Besides, her platform doesn't involve the dangers of Olestra or cruelty to animals: I'm outtie!

Who else can I squeeze like an empty toothpaste tube for connections? My grandmother's distant cousin was a burlesque dancer. My first–cousin–once–removed is friends with Michael Bolton and Lisa Loeb. Ahh jeez. I might as well start applying to a variety of high–end fast food franchisees, right this instant.

I went to high school with the daughter of general manager of the Philadelphia Flyers, Bobby Clarke. I could ride the zamboni, not as a career, but because it would be cool to say I have. I could sell $4.00 beers at the stadium where they play. Maybe Bobby would let me be a goalie because I have strong teeth. Most importantly he probably knows Joey Lawrence, a Philadelphia native. Joey Lawrence probably won't be able to get me a job, but I think he's awefully cute and he could be my new, awefully cute boyfriend.

Wow, I'm not in such bad shape after all. I am within close access to many an influential person. I still need to develop my schmoozing ability. I need to develop a taste for eating crow: to be able to swallow my pride and say, "yes," gulp, "I am a go–getter. I can never sit still." Heh–heh, go to get some cigarettes and whiskey that is, huh, huh. And it's true, I can't sit still, but only because I have ADD (or as they call it in the profession "ants in the pants.")

So I decided to enroll in a class at the Hilton that will make me breathe fire, and not apologize for it. There is a guarantee that you will learn to make "all the right connections," or they will give me my money back. There is nothing to lose, but time (I wink as I say it, they taught me that in class.) The first lesson is how to shake someone's hand and mean it.

My teacher, Charles "The Shark" Charleson, said you need to squeeze the person's hand, then release. As you do this you look them directly in the eye, never wavering. I tried this when I met the Chancellor, but I just got a weird Scottish rash.

Once you have that down you're ready for conversation skills. Charles said never, ever, talk about three things when trying to Shmooze: politics, how you like your steak cooked, or "personal female hygeine issues."

"If you like Clinton, they'll think you have loose morals. If you don't like him, you're too stuffy. If you like your steak well–done you're anal–retentive, if you like it rare, you're impatient. Ixnay on the girl stuff. Um, I don't have to elaborate right, honey?"

Well, I don't like to be called "honey," and there was an alley next door to the Hilton so I left the seminar for some bumper bowling.

In all seriousness, I know I need to learn how to learn these important social skills for my future. But I just can't discuss the weather when there's a window right next to me, you know? It's a waste o' time. I like to gab, but I'm not so good at it. So what? If I had a dollar I'd give you .99.

The unemployment line is no conga line, but it's better than complaining about traffic or weak coffee. But um, if you know someone in the business, here's my card. I am an over–achiever with computer experience...

Campus safety

Picture this: a girl is walking home alone from one of those late night classes... "What's over there?" she thinks and her heart skips a beat. "Oh, it's only a funny looking bush — but did you hear that sound?" She stops in her tracks. "It's only a squirrel." Well maybe we're not all that paranoid. The question is: should we be?

In addition to the dangers of crossing the various poorly lit roads and trying not to trip over your own feet as you head up the goat path, (well OK, so maybe that's just my problem) does one have to worry about nightly stalkers? Hey kids, this isn't New York City, then again, it's not Idaho either.

"So what classes are you taking this semester?" my mom asks the usual mom questions. I begin, "Well, I'm taking chemistry, ecology, and that night class..." The pause on the phone is strained. Maybe she's just tying her shoe on the other end. "How late?" she finally asks tersely. I can almost see the tension forming. It takes maybe an hour to convince her that I really will be OK coming home at 10 p.m. It's not like it'd be a Friday night for God's sake!

I think the matter is settled. Then about a week later I get a package from home in the mail. Excitedly, I tear open the little brown paper wrapped box, lift the lid, and there nestled in a bedding of fluffy white stuff is: a genuine sterling silver police whistle. Hmmm... just what I always wanted! Thanks, mom. But it doesn't end there.

There's a reason why it comes with a sturdy lanyard. So now, on pain of death, each night when I go out, I wear this rather large metal whistle around my neck. It's like preparing for a showdown. As the sun sets, I slide the lanyard around my head. It's even got a little rubber covering around the mouthpiece so my lips won't freeze to the metal. They think of everything at those police whistle factories, I guess.

It's rumored that at Welseley College, everyone is required to wear a whistle (maybe that's where my mom got her brilliant idea) and when a whistle goes off, a police officer will be at the site within five minutes. At Williams College they've got those cool little blue–lit emergency boxes about every two feet — the whole campus looks like a cute blue– lit Christmas tree.

Now excuse my reasoning, but it would seem to me that a larger university in a more urban area (well at least we've got more than just cows roaming around) there ought to be more security, not less. But this is good old UMass after all, the well–oiled machine of bureaucratic benefits. And it's not like we don't have those emergency boxes (if you can somehow manage to find one in time). And it's not like there aren't people hanging around to come to your rescue should you need it (although personally I would run the other way if I heard a police whistle blow).

Carolyn Dong

So as I'm sliding my way down the hill, I have to strain to my left so as not to constantly drag the bottom of my ten pound cardboard art portfolio along the icy bumps and through the dirty puddles of crud concentrated in the many potholes along the road. This is probably not the most ideal situation to be in to defend against a hypothetical attacker. I could perhaps exert enough force with my free mittened hand to poke the would–be–assailant in the eyeball, giving me enough time to successfully untangle myself from the lanyard around my neck and blow the whistle.

What would happen then? Would some noble young stud of a guy come running to my rescue? Yeah right. This is UMass after all. I mean, what would you do if you heard a whistle blow or even someone scream? I know what I would do — run the other way thinking that some Thursday night party had gotten out of control.

Perhaps the best protection against some unfortunate events is to always be aware of your surroundings. Keep a level head and remember where those little yellow call boxes are located. If you happen to have a sterling silver police whistle, wear it (you never know when it may come in handy). Maybe some day police whistles will become the latest trend (like slap bracelets — only better).

Until then I guess I'll be in the fashion minority. And should the occasion arise, (and I sure as hell hope it doesn't) I will drop my awkward art portfolio in the mud, whip off my right hand mitten so I can somehow unzip my puffy down jacket, reach in and pull out my trusty whistle. I will place it to my lips and blow a not–so–shrill screech that will frighten away my would–be–assailant (yeah that'll show them!). Mom would be so proud.

Carolyn Dong is a UMass student.

A start for UHS

With the rising debate on the issue of medical care in this country, I think its important to assess some very basic aspects of treatment that people have overlooked on this campus. University Health Services (UHS) is in a position of power. People walk into Health Services with a problem, and are relying on UHS to treat them.

The words the medical staff use are equally as powerful as the medicine they prescribe. A friend of mine recently went into UHS because he was not feeling well. After waiting for over an hour, my friend was told that he either had mono or strep throat. Another friend of mine went down to UHS crying because she was ill. She was then told that most women who come into Health Services are crying because they think they are pregnant.

Jeff Dell

This all goes back to something my mother taught me at a very young age. It's never what you say, but how you say it. I think this would be a good starting point for UHS to improve the quality of their care. Additionally, I think limiting this solely to UHS would be a major lapse in judgement. Other medical centers undoubtedly make similar mistakes, and those cannot be overlooked either. All in all, this is certainly a starting point in improving the medical care at UHS.

I think it's important for people to hear the power of what the doctor is saying here. "Well, we are not sure quite what it is. We think you may have mono, though it might be strep throat." While I realize the medical staff is doing the best they can to assist their patients, not much can be said for their bedside manner. Clearly, the medical staff is not trying to cause anyone distress; however, the net effect is the same in each of those statements. The patients not only get an incorrect impression of what illness they may have, they are also caused a certain amount of distress from the statements of the doctor.

There is a clear link between a person's medical condition and his psychological state of mind. To undermine this area of treatment would eliminate a certain dimension which exists to any illness.

What can UHS do to assist their patients? This is really the million dollar question right here. I think that UHS, to start, needs to identify the sensitive area which they work in and present patients with positive feedback. This is not to say that they should say, "This is great, you have mono!" but more to identify the problem in a manner which is more gentle. This is saying, "We believe you have strep throat. We would like to run further tests to make sure it isn't something else." This tells the patient exactly what his condition is, and tells his that he may have something else, but does it in a way that is not extreme.

Very often it seems UHS doesn't have the answers, or is uncertain as to the nature of a person's illness. There is nothing wrong with not having the answers. It would certainly be more reassuring to know what the problem is, but if UHS doesn't have the answers it's not the end of the world. It would be reassuring if the patient is told of outside resources, so he can go elsewhere for treatment. UHS simply may not be equipped to handle the patient's specific problem or they simply do not have the answer. Giving the person a local resource would enable patients to seek further treatment from an additional source.

I realize the staff at UHS has many responsibilities, serving the University community and others, with quality medical care, and that they see a wide range of people with a vast number of problems. This is exactly why many of these experts should be so concerned with their bedside manner. With the number of patients coming in and out of UHS, it is important that these people are not only given the care they need, but are also comforted.

"She was then told that most women who come into Health Services are crying because they think they are pregnant."

It is clear that UHS can do a lot to improve their medical care, without really changing anything. By simply adapting their bedside manner to a more appropriate style, they can accomplish a great deal, and provide better service to all of their patients.

Jeff Dell is a UMass student.

The religious enforcers

Cults on campus... (Uh, excuse me. Religious organizations like the Upside–down Club). I really couldn't care less about what they believe. They can even preach minimally about them. But when they come up to me and ask if I'm religious and want to be saved, I want to scream. Maybe they know I'm Christian because I am part of Campus Crusade for Christ and they've gone through the files.

It doesn't really matter to me, but being approached time and time again about Bible studies, carpooling to church and different events can make anyone sick. The Upside–Down Club is the only club that has ever approached me. They apparently stand outside of the D.C.s with nothing better to do than harass innocent students and start questioning them. It generally goes like this:

"Hi, what is your name?" — "Emily."

"Are you a Christian?" — "Yes."

"Would you like to join the Springfield Church of Christ?" — "I don't know."

"Well, how about we exchange phone numbers?" — "Okay..."

"During the week we have Bible studies, get–togethers, sometimes fashion shows, you know. Are you interested?" — "Possibly. But I don't want to be part of a cult."

Emily Vacanti

"Oh, don't worry. I'm part of the Upside–down Club. We're not a cult."

"I don't want any ideals forced upon me."

"Oh, don't worry. We just want you to come to our Bible studies and church and to follow our beliefs and everything we say."

"That sounds kind of forced."

"Oh no. Just start coming and contributing. You'll learn to love us."

What I don't understand is why they are allowed to do this on our open campus. I've actually avoided the D.C.s just because I didn't want to be harassed. I understand that being able to preach on an open campus extends the possibilities of an organization immensely, but it irritates the hell out of any student approached. I've been told that if you say that you are not Christian, they try to convert you and insist that you need to be saved.

Why?

I will decide if I need to be saved, whatever that means and then I'll decide if I want to be saved. Who knows? Dancing with the devil sounds much more appealing to me than joining the Upside–down Club. At least the devil is straight about what he wants: your soul, and for you to be a slave to him forever. The Upside–down Club convinces you to come to a meeting... then Bible studies, events and the like, and then they ask you for cash contributions. This should not be allowed.

Some clubs impose fees, which is completely understandable. Those clubs have non–cult necessities. I just don't respect asking for contributions. I mean, isn't asking the members to harass non–members enough? Man, it's like non–straightforward selling of your soul, leasing it forever.

When I joined Campus Crusade for Christ, it was because I saw their table on the concourse. They interested me. I was not pressured to join. The members were enthusiastic and welcoming, not pushy and insistent. That's why I joined.

Clubs like the Upside–down Club should either stop harassing people or be abolished. Whatever they preach, they need to keep it to themselves.

Sri Lanka: Quest for peace

Recently, I visited the native homeland of my parents, Sri Lanka. This visit was quite an experience. I had a great time, but there was still a sense of insecurity and drastic change.

These feelings stemmed from the Liberation Tigers for a Tamil Eelam (LTTE), a Tamil organization that demands a nation for its own people and feels Sri Lanka is a worthy candidate for settlement.

Founded in 1976, the LTTE is composed of over 10,000 people, and their organization is spread world wide. Their gorilla warfare tactics and international funding have given the LTTE a strong foot hole in the upper most region of Sri Lanka, in the province known as Jafna.

Channa Wijesinghe

Currently, the Sri Lankan government has been trying to infiltrate the leaders of the LTTE in an attempt to stop their cause, but because of poor weapons and manpower the fight still continues and there is no mutual agreement in sight.

As a Sri Lankan brought up in the West, I have been able to view the events of this land war with an unbiased eye. The Tamil cause is a worthy one; just as the Jews after the second World War who wanted a country of their own, the Tamils request the same.

The only thing that I am not fond of is the fact that they use horribly militant methods by which to achieve this goal. Their actions are almost reminiscent of the tactics that the Viet–Cong used in the Vietnamese War: suicide bombings, human massacre, and sometimes killing Buddhist monks to get their point across.

Recently, in a hotel bombing the suicide bomber was a pregnant woman. The guards could not search a pregnant woman therefore she was able to maneuver into the hotel and cause one of the most destructive explosions in the nation's history.

There is another variable to the equation; the Janika Vimuthi Paramuna organization (JVP), whose name literally means 'liberation front.' The JVP organization is mainly composed of college students who feel a communist government would be the only solution to the current situation as they are opposed to the current Sri Lankan government and the LTTE.

The JVP feel that the LTTE is splitting up the country because, for their goal to be met, Sri Lanka must be united. Communism will bring unity to the country, plus it might also help the economy because products would be manufactured in Sri Lanka for Sri Lankans. The opposing side to turning communism is economic sanctions, brought on by other countries that will destroy its already fragile economy.

The LTTE is a true terrorist organization and because of their hostile actions and their brand of militant justice, they have made matters harder for other Tamils. Sri Lankans have very strong feelings toward Tamils and it is not an uncommon practice to deny Tamils education, work and land on that one basis. In the Sri Lankan economy, Tamils have the lowest paid jobs also having the least property value.

These attitudes cause a vicious cycle of the mistreatment of Tamils by the majority of Sri Lankans and the consequent and continuous strike of the LTTE. In 1995, there was a peace talk with the representatives of a Tamil Eelam and the Sri Lankan government. Nothing was accomplished from the peace talks and this caused more friction between Sri Lankan and Tamil groups.

By visiting the country in 1998, I have found that these tensions still hold true. There is no melting pot of the two groups as the Tamils are assumed to live in certain areas while Sri Lankans live in others.

Talking to natives, one also finds this feeling of hate on both sides and toward each other. This causes uneasiness in the JVP which, among other things, is fighting for a united Sri Lanka, and with the continuation of the war in Jafna feel that both sides are to blame. They protest the Sri Lankan government for attacking Tamil cities and killing LTTE soldiers. The JVP feel that much more can be accomplished from peace talks.

The Sri Lankan government is reluctant to listen especially because of pressure from the public to implement saturation bombing on the Tamil controlled parts of Sri Lanka. Since its first emergence in 1976 and after it declared its war on Sri Lanka in 1980, there has been over 100,000 deaths associated with the land war and hundreds more die every month.

Recently, because of the unrest and the large amounts of death associated to this war, American Sri Lankans launched a campaign to notify the United States of the land war in Sri Lanka and also make the U.S. government aware of the LTTE terrorist group. Their cries did not go unanswered. The U.S. formally declared the LTTE as a world terrorist group. This was a major victory by American Sri Lankans.

I was part of this campaign after talking to my uncles and relatives that have been survivors of LTTE bombings and after hearing their stories about how their loved ones have been killed in this war. I felt that, in this sea of political red tape, something must be done.

The Russian life: then and now

A glance of the nation from the 1997 strike to today

Hundreds of Russian citizens assemble in the city of Archangel for the first nation–wide strike in history

As I stared out the bus window on the way from the Russian airport on the outskirts of Moscow to the inner city, I felt somewhat let down.

Raised by the colorful bright lights and commercial images of mainstream USA, my upbringing had not prepared me for this. It seemed that whichever artist God selected to paint this landscape was left with only shades of grey on their palate.

The only barrier that separated the white of the sky with the white of the ground was a line of barren black trees that resembled trickles of ink to my naive eyes.

As time went on, and I got a chance to see more than the countryside, I learned that, even though there are glorious golden and multi–colored domes and red brick buildings in the beautiful capital city, the real jewels of the country are the people.

This was no more evident to me than when, in the northern port city of Archangel, I stumbled upon a local assembly in honor of the first nation–wide strike in history. This was in the spring of 1997, and many of the citizens there — and throughout the great country — had gone months without being paid. The people in Archangel gathered in hordes with signs and made their feelings known, as did similar groups in Moscow and St. Petersberg, among others.

Seth Koenig

If such a mass of people had gone that great a time span without a consistent income here in America, the populous would panic and fall into an emotional tailspin. A state of chaos would very likely crash onto the nation like an uncontrollable tidal wave, but not in Russia.

The Russians remained calm, though justifiably furious, and stretched each coin further than the most frugal American can fathom. They gave their newly democratic government time to adjust to the unfamiliar system, and then they took action. The nation went on strike.

Imagine for a second any attempt to organize such a unified effort in the United States. On the other side of the globe from Archangel, there would be major problems getting two separate people to get along for just a few minutes, much less thousands of people for a number of hours.

Despite the country's effort, however, the economic situation in Russia is not much better today.

"If you believe peoples' accounts of [life in Russia], it's just getting worse and worse," University of Massachusetts Russian professor Joseph Lake said. "As far as the people not being paid, that's become somewhat less of a problem formally, because this new... government is paying people more — although there are still huge back–logs — the thing is, they're paying in rubles that have lost a huge percent of their value. The inflation is now much worse than in 1997)."

Still, in a society where the planet's revolution depends on cash flow, the Russians survive with what amounts to almost none.

As an American, I can not comprehend this ability to hang from this thin a thread without falling — and I could not two years ago.

"It always looks so much worse from here than it does when you're there. I life goes on, and the old cliches about Russians being able to get along under any conditions are very true. They're nothing if not flexible," Lake said.

Regardless of how bad the economy is, the citizens of Russia make it through the day with little, if any, foreign aid. The United Nations sends money and food to help the ailing people, but rarely does any common man see this help.

Corruption has not been washed away with Communism like so many in the Western world believe. Often times a dense screen of politicians and Mafia leaders filter the incoming aid to the point where there is very little left once the sun hits the streets.

That which does make it into the hands of the average man is often not as necessary as the international powers think.

"Just recently, the Americans sent a huge amount of food. I've read several opinions that said that this aid isn't needed," Lake said. "What Russians need to do is get their agricultural system effective. It's one of the richest countries in the world in practically every way, including agriculture potential."

The Russians will rebound. All their potential will be reached.

'Untouchability' for many

JULIA SEARS / COLLEGIAN

Former Dalit children, also known as untouchables, who recently converted to Islam to gain avoid discrimination in Indian society.

Drinking out of segregated tumblers at tea stalls, not being able to wear sandals or shirts into your village, having to ask a person of upper caste to fill your water vessel, and having to succumb to any demands of an upper caste person are only some of the inequalities and social injustices that continue to face the 'untouchables' in South India.

The caste system is a driving force in daily Indian life and could be argued as a product of the Hindu religion. Since India's independence and the construction of their first constitution in 1947, the practice of discrimination of untouchables within the hierarchical caste system has been prohibited... but only on paper.

In Tamil Nadu, a southern state in India, it is estimated that 25 percent of the population belongs to untouchable castes, a section of society that is often thought of as less than human. With independence, untouchables demanded to be called Dalits (literally the oppressed and downtrodden people).

With the rise of the Dalit movement, came the need for a new identity; an identity they could call their own, not one given to them by upper caste Hindus. Thus they have had no nationality, no unity.

Presently, they are basing their identity on common experiences of economic, social and religious discrimination, oppression and the need for liberation.

Kristen Anderson

The Dalit movement asks, "Help us gain the right 'to be humans' first of all: fighting for/demanding 'human rights' could only be an agenda for our sons and daughters of the next generation." The overall movement has taken a variety of forms from religious conversions to organized activists groups.

With the influx of missionaries to India, conversions to Christianity were among the first social movements by the untouchables to renounce the Hindu caste system. Christianity became their savior, and many untouchable conversions took place to escape the Hindu caste system that was so inhuman. In the beginning, the conversions worked and the untouchables gained new respect in the society as Christians. But over time and with the conversions of many more Indians, the caste system was established within the Christian communities as well.

Due to the large number of untouchable conversions to Christianity several generations ago, there is a large Christian Dalit population today. Currently they are struggling to develop their own theology because they cannot identify with Western Christians or upper caste Indian Christians. Christian Dalits are developing their own way of reading and interpreting Christianity to suit their experiences as Dalits in India's hierarchical social system.

A more recent phenomenon and conscious social movement has been the Dalit conversion to Islam. Within the last 10–15 years conversion to Islam has been especially popular in Tamil Nadu. This wide–spread phenomenon in Tamil Nadu consists of entire Dalit villages converting to Islam to avoid discrimination within Hindu society.

Village leaders I spoke with while studying abroad in South India described that with the conversion to Islam they became different people, not only in their own minds, but in the minds of upper caste Hindus. This meant they automatically lost their untouchability status and became a more honorable part of society; respected and able to drink out of the same tea stall tumblers as the upper caste, for example.

These mass–conversions have remained mostly non–violent although upper caste resistance is not uncommon especially as more and more Dalit villages convert. However, the question remains as to if their caste identity as Dalits and untouchables can really be forgotten. Christian conversion was a temporary solution. Can Islamic conversion really stop or prevent oppression, discrimination and untouchability from occurring within an age–old deeply ingrained social system that defines an entire civilization?

Only time will tell.

Not all Dalits seek conversion as their escape from life as an untouchable. There is a growing movement of Dalits that are actively organizing rallies, protests, and confrontations to challenge the pervasive untouchability that continues regardless of the 52–year–old constitution which outlawed it.

Most well–known throughout Tamil Nadu and throughout India is the Dalit Panther Iyyakum movement (DPI), who have used the Black Panthers as their model of fighting inequality. A DPI movement village leader, T Pandian, said the goal of the movement is to "Forget about caste and think about society... and everybody should become equal." Pandian said that slowly changes are being made "because now people can wear their sandals and walk on the road. But still we cannot go into the residences of the upper caste people."

And then there are those Dalits that neither seek conversion nor become active in these movements; they simply accept their conditions. As one Dalit man I interviewed in a village said, "A lot of incidents are going on a day to day basis. I am willing to fight against all this kind of discrimination but still I have no economical, educational, or political background to fight against this. So that I simply leave them all alone. And I am simply living my life. Everyday I eat. That is enough for me."

Out of Tune goes down smoothly

OUT OF TUNE

Mojave 3 is one of those bands that sound best on the headphones late at night, when everyone else in the house has either passed out or has to wake up in four hours to go to work. Songwriter Neil Halsted certainly knows his way around the sad lullaby, as proved by the album's best track "Yer Feet," which begins with the line "I was drunk when I met you" and gets even more despairing.

Halsted and his companions are English, but the songs on Out of Tune are clearly indebted to the laments of American country folk like Nick Drake as well as more contemporary American slowcore/country acts like Palace and Low. But Mojave 3 are in the end slightly too erethral and shiny– metallic for their own good. Out of Tune goes down almost too smoothly, like a perfect gulp of silver-cold water that you swallow and then forget you drank. All of which matters little at three in the morning. B–

CENTRAL RESERVATION
Beth Orton
Arista

Next Big–Thing Brit Beth Orton got her first big break singing on several tracks with the then–unknown Chemical Brothers, even though her personal sound; spacey folk–pop, is light years away from the Brothers' block–rocking beats. But even though you can't dance to her acclaimed first album, Trailer Park, the beat–happy crowd stuck with her. Folk listeners loved her evocations of heartbreak and her delicate touch on the guitar. The Indie–rock crowd appreciated the hooks that lurked beneath the elegant surface. Everyone loved her voice, awkward and fluid at once, completely distinctive, strong enough to touch listeners across genre lines.

Her fine sophomore album, Central Reservation, brims over with assured, clean arrangments that balance electronic and acoustic sounds as smoothly as any other artist working. While some of the songs on the album's second half don't fully bloom, the first half is nearly perfect. The single "Stolen Car" is a groovy, compact trip–pop number, and "Sweetest Decline" is Orton recast as a lounge singer in a jazz club on the moon. The album also features a soaring ballad "Pass in Time," with folk–jazz pioneer Terry Callier, one of Orton's musical heroes, on backing vocals.

Even though not every song hits, Orton's voice is always enough to guide you through the vague, repetitive sections. Orton's voice is a bird bound for the sky. It's a voice that is bound for greatness. B+ (R.R.)

DISEMBODY: THE NEW FLESH
Skinlab
Century Media

Bay Area thrash metal newcomers Skinlab are back on the scene with their latest release Disembody: The New Flesh. The title was actually created by a Skinlab fan who responded to a contest the band advertised in Metal Hammer magazine asking for a title to their new LP. Vocalist/bass guitarist Steev Esquivel liked the title since it had relevance to the lineup changes the group had incurred since their debut album Bound, Gagged and Blindfolded.

Gone from the original lineup are guitarists Mike Roberts and Gary Wendt, now replaced with guitarists Snake and Scott Sergeant. This new album also brings a slightly different sound to Skinlab. Whereas the first album consisted mostly of very heavy guitar riffs over a slow pace, Disembody has a few songs which are very fast and upbeat, while at the same time retaining the trademark heaviness.

Of the CD's 10 tracks, a few stand out above the rest. "So Far From The Truth," featured on 1998's Eyesore EP, has the same killer riffs and crushing heaviness one expects from Skinlab, but also introduces the new, faster style experimented with on this album. Midway through the album, the track "Breathe" is easily the highlight of the CD and the best song the band has ever recorded.

The song is heavy and aggressive and showcases each member of the group at their best. Esquivel's vocals are rough and malleable; he can go from a growl to spoken word easily and it always sounds good. Paul Hopkins' pounding drum rhythms are most audible on this track and both new guitarists give great performances with a great riff and precise playing.

The song that sounds most uncharacteristically Skinlab is ironically their first video off of the album, "Know Your Enemies." The sound is almost too upbeat and throughout the song there is very little variation from the short riff. But that song seems like a godsend when compared to "I Name My Pain" and "Looks Can Be Deceiving," which are so sparse and boring they sound like filler tracks, something that should not be on a ten track CD.

So while this release is far from perfect, Skinlab have produced another quality record well worth a listen. However, if they hope to aspire to the level of greatness their obvious inspiration Machine Head have attained, it is going to take a lot more than this. B (Michael Delano)

Brit–folk rocker Beth Orton's second LP is miles away from her work with the Chemical Brothers.

Mingus Big Band gives FAC big thrills

THE MINGUS BIG BAND
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
March 27

The Fine Arts Center Concert Hall had it's roof torn off Saturday night by the likes of John Stubblefield, John Hicks, Gene Jackson, Philip Harper and the rest of contemporary music's baddest ensemble, the Mingus Big Band. This rotating, 30-plus member organization of musicians is committed to reinterpreting and breathing new life into the compositions of the late African-American composer Charles Mingus.

The program began with one of Mingus' most widely recognized tunes, "Haitian Fight Song." Saxophonist and emcee for the night Alex Foster introduced the tune as "one of Mingus' protest songs" as bassist Andy McKee dug in with a solo on "Oh Lord, Don't Let Them Drop That Atomic Bomb On Me," an oddly balanced blues, full of strange accents and rhythms supplied by drummer Gene Jackson.

As the tune built to a firm drive, tenorist Stubblefield preceded to reminisce on Rahsaan Roland Kirk's days with Mingus, with a burning solo complete with gutsy screeches and circular breathing.

The final piece of the night, "Moanin'" was a real burner which let all of the soloists soar. Jackson's driving, full rhythm patterns propelled Mike Sill's baritone solo which segued into a section of chorus trading among the saxophones and then among the trumpets. The fire of the entire program was captured in the rounding choruses and was an illustration of the virtuosity and spiritual connection these musicians share in the name of Charles Mingus.

The tune sounded like a cliche big band melody taken at almost double tempo, which was very effective for the high degree of interplay between orchestra and soloists in this arrangement. The soloists bounced off of the backing riffs of the ensemble, and used those lines as themes to build their improvisations.

The beautiful ballad "Self Portrait in Three Colors" began the next set In a light, masterful arrangement without the trumpet section, and which featured no soloists. Next, one of Mingus' most controversial pieces, "Fables of Faubus" proved to be a high point of the night. Surprisingly though, it did not feature Mingus' notorious vocal section of the tune.

Another favorite, "Goodbye Porkpie Hat" followed, in which tenor soloist Vincent Herring beautifully interpreted the ballad section of the tune. The evening came to a peak when John Stubblefield finally brought the house down with his solo on "Oh Lord, Don't Let Them Drop That Atomic Bomb On Me," an oddly balanced blues, full of strange accents and rhythms supplied by drummer Gene Jackson.

As the tune built to a firm drive, tenorist Stubblefield preceded to reminisce on Rahsaan Roland Kirk's days with Mingus, with a burning solo complete with gutsy screeches and circular breathing.

Crew wins in a photo finish

By Chris Spring
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's crew team capped off its only home meet of the season with an exciting victory over Boston University. The margin of victory was less than a second in what amounted to a photo finish. It was a fitting ending to a day with such favorable conditions.

Coach Jim Dietz was very pleased with his team's effort.

"This year we've been in the water a lot less than last year due to flooding on the Connecticut river, and it also froze at the last minute," Dietz said.

On pulling out the last second victory on Sunday, he explained simply, "We had the bigger, stronger girls."

BU pulled out to an early advantage, but the Minutewomen, led by Heather Walker and Jen Miller, were able to come back in the last 500 meters of the race.

"We were coming off a three–and–a–half mile race in Ireland, so this was much more of a sprint. We ran the race in 5:51, and normally a good time for us would be 6:30," coach Dietz said.

The favorable conditions were responsible for the swift trek down the river.

UMass' time for the race was 5:51.2. BU finished at 5:51.6 and Kansas took third with a time of 6:0.8. UMass qualified for the championship race by defeating Kansas and New Hampshire in the first heat. BU had advanced by easily beating Boston College in their preliminary race. New Hampshire defeated Boston College in the varsity consolation race.

In the junior varsity championship race, UMass (6:15) finished second to BU (6:13) and ahead of New Hampshire (6:30). UMass lost to Kansas in the junior varsity petite final.

Boston University also took the varsity four–plus race, followed by the Minutewomen, who finished in front of Boston College and the Boston University "B" squad.

In the novice ranks, BU was victorious in both of the eight–woman races. UMass finished second in the first novice race and third in the second novice.

The Minutewomen are back in action April 10–11. They head to Camden, N.J., where they will face off against Villanova on the 10th and Virginia on the 11th.

Gymnasts just miss A–10 title

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

For the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team, this season's Atlantic 10 Championships were reminiscent of last year's; close to a conference championship, but not quite good enough to bring home the title.

UMass fell to George Washington for the second time in as many years in the A–10 Championship, meet which was held this past weekend in Philadelphia, by under two–tenths of a point. Last year, UMass fell by exactly two–tenths of a point. The Minutewomen squad placed second in the four– team field, ahead of Rhode Island and Temple.

The Minutewomen's season–high score of 194.525 was not enough to topple the Colonials, who posted a 194.650. The loss was the first in conference play in the entire 1999 campaign for the Maroon and White.

Leading the UMass squad was junior Mandy Mosby, who won the all–around competition for the second year in a row with a score of 39.200. Her score was one–tenth of a point better than Darden Wilee. Despite only posting a team–high on one event, Mosby was best on the floor exercise for Massachusetts with a 9.875.

Mosby's performance also captured her the distinction of Most Outstanding Performer of the championship.

UMass seniors Anita Sanyal and Jennifer Pokrana tied for first place on the uneven bars with a score of 9.875. Sanyal was also tops on the balance beam with a score of 9.925. Their ability earned them distinctions on the A–10 All– Conference Team.

Finishing second in the tournament on the balance beam apparatus for UMass was Mary Moore who scored a 9.900. Her score contributed to a team score of 49.300 on that apparatus that was best in the tournament.

Senior Michelle LoPresti finished the all–around competition with a score of 38.400. LoPresti topped the UMass team with a vault score of 9.800. Freshman Tracy Chew was the third UMass competitor in the all–around. Her performance on every event earned her a 38.475.

The Minutewomen will have at least one more meet in their future. Their season scores have earned them a bid to the NCAA Regional Championships for the sixth straight season. UMass will travel to Penn State on Saturday, April 10 to face No. 6 Penn State, No. 8 Arizona State, New Hampshire, Pittsburgh and conference foe Rhode Island.

to do something. We are working on everybody taking some responsibility," McClellan said.

UMass will need to remain solid on defense, which it has done all year. The Minutewomen's highest goals–against total came Saturday afternoon in New York, when they gave up 11. For the Minutewomen, the most challenging thing on defense is who they are missing. Colleen Wales and Shalee Merkle look like they will both miss most, if not all, of the remainder of the season with knee injuries.

Which goalie will play also stands to be a large question for the Minutewomen. Both Tara Durkin (2–1) and Jen Nardi (1–1) played in the game against the Orangewomen.

"We don't know who's going to start in goal. It is becoming more and more challenging. Physically, they are both capable of doing the job. Right now, it's [a question of] who is more mentally ready to play," McClellan said.

The Bears of Brown have some weapons the Minutewomen will need to contain. Junior Christi Gigon is the Bears' major threat on offense. She has collected eight goals and three assists for 11 points.

■ baseball

Williamson took the mound for the last inning in relief. Loomie, a Longmeadow native, struck out two of the five Husky batters he faced.

Connecticut's third baseman Clarke Claudill had a monstrous day at the plate, hitting 3–for–4 including a home run. First baseman Brian Packin, who has tallied 24 RBI this season, belted a solo home run, his sixth home run on the year. Three other Husky hitters contributed with two runs batted in apiece.

Mark Monkiewicz earned the start for UConn but let up 10 earned runs in two full innings before Fulchino relieved him.

Between the two schools, 11 errors were committed. But in the end, UMass' four errors proved more costly than UConn's seven.

The Minutemen return home to the Earl Lorden Field at 3 p.m. today to host another Connecticut squad, Hartford. UMass will take on their first Atlantic 10 action of Friday and Saturday when the head to Duquesne for a three–game series.

gave us a good sense of reality about our team."

The performance of Annie Hamilton impressed Dixon.

"Annie's performance at No. 2 was great," Dixon said. "She really played well against Colgate."

After the Colgate win, the Minutewomen took on the Bonnies in an Atlantic 10 match. The team won without losing a single match.

"We trounced St. Bonnie's," Dixon said. "It was clear that they are not in the same league as us."

Dixon was very pleased with the play of her whole team, but was especially impressed with the play of senior Gillian Kane at the No. 6 singles spot.

"We put Gillian in at the No. 6 spot," Dixon said. "She played great and after her win, I heard her say that it was great to win."

The two wins for the team all but assure the Minutewomen of the second seed in the A–10 tournament.

"It is clear that we'll be seeded second in the A–10s," Dixon said. "The important thing for us right now is to stay on track, everything from here on out is in preparation for the tournament."

The team has a break in its schedule after the weekend's matches. The Minutewomen will host Fairfield University on April 8 at 3 p.m. at the Upper Boyden Courts.

"The lull in our schedule is coming at a great time for us," Dixon said. "A break after two huge wins is good for our preparation."

Freshman Helena Horak was named Freshman of the Week in the A–10 conference for her play over the weekend. She defeated Cyan Brokhage of Colgate by a score of 6–2, 6–1, while playing in the No. 4 singles spot. She followed the Colgate match with another superb performance against St. Bonaventure. Horak swept the Bonnies' No. 4 singles player Andrea Irons 6–0, 6–0, to garner the honors.

The Minutemen will have little time to celebrate the win over their state rivals. Saturday they return to action at Garber Field for a contest against Butler, a team that competed in last year's NCAA tournament.

"They're a very good A They're a physical team, they're an active team," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "They're ranked ahead of us. It should be a very good game."

He's no Houdini.
The great escape artist Harry Houdini vowed that his greatest feat would be to rise from the grave.
He didn't deliver. But someone else did. The man claimed to be the God who created the Universe. And said he would die and then bodily rise from the dead to prove he was God.
Jesus Christ's resurrection from the dead distinguishes him from all other religious leaders.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You're likely to have trouble today getting in touch with someone you've been thinking about a lot lately. Keep trying!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may not be able to avoid those who would be critical of you today, but this needn't result in any negative feelings. Keep things in perspective.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — A close friend may become more of a competitor than a supporter before the day is out, but this is likely to be true for only a short time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — What's expected today is likely to be the most interesting thing that happens. Be willing to surprise yourself with others.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You're sure to be in the spotlight at least during a portion of the day, but there's no reason to behave in any way out of character. Be yourself!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Style is everything today. You have a firm grasp of substance right now, so you can concentrate more on how things are "coming across" to others.

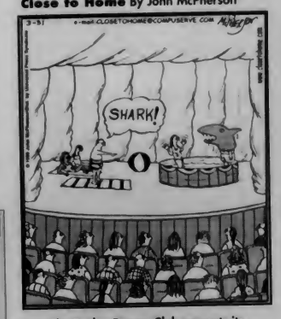
LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You'll learn the difference between doing something right and stopping short of the mark. You'll understand a recent error as a result.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You're likely to meet someone today who will figure prominently in your life on at least two occasions in the future. Get ready for a surprise!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You'll find yourself waiting, waiting and waiting some more today for something that is unclear. When it comes, you'll know.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Don't let yourself be fooled by those who would have you believe that you cannot change things for the better. You can make a difference.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — A bargain is available to you and only you today, but you've got to act fast. You can't expect this offer to last forever!



PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — This is a good day to take time out from your busy schedule to get back in touch with the way you're really feeling, even if only for a few moments.

Celtics struggle as Blazers stake claim in the west

There is disarray in Beantown. The beloved green and white are putting forth one of the most pitiful brands of hoop in recent memory. The past couple of seasons, they have not been as competitive as Boston would like, but at least they were playing to their ability.

At season's outset, the team and coach Rick Pitino had playoff aspirations and were ecstatic about stealing Paul Pierce with the 10th overall pick in the 1998 draft. Thus far, it has been nothing but heartache for Celtics fans.

The Celtics, with a mark of 9–18, possess the third worst record in the

Bryan Smith on the NBA

Eastern Conference with only the hapless Chicago Bulls (8–21) and the dormant New Jersey Nets (5– 23) behind them. Pitino cannot seem to get his team to gel and transform into the team he envisioned when he took over the reigns in Boston. The current crop of lottery picks (Antoine Walker, Ron Mercer, and Kenny Anderson) are a disgrace to the honor of the parquet.

• How about the Toronto Raptors? The fans in Canada finally have something to cheer about, along with a new home and two of the most electrifying youngsters in the league in Vince Carter and Tracey McGrady. The combination of these talents, along with the solid play of Doug Christie, has the Raptors at .500 for the first time in over a month.

Carter is seemingly running away in the Rookie of the Year race. He finds himself on the highlight real every night with some sort of outstanding dunk or a circus shot that he became so noted for in his years at North Carolina.

• The black and red flag of the Portland Trail Blazers has been hoisted to the top of the Western Conference pole. This team is loaded from top to bottom. With the emergence of Jim Jackson, the Blazers don't look to be letting go of the top spot.

Portland does what it needs to win. It plays solid team basketball, which allows it to have six players averaging double figures.

The Blazers are also making the Rose Garden one of the most intimidating arenas for opponents to visit. Portland has only left its home with sour faces once this season. Winning at home is a must to compete, and the Blazers are doing just that.

• I don't like Allen Iverson, but I can't argue with numbers that he has been putting up this season. The guy may have finally found himself a secure spot. He is still not a true point guard, but for now, he will suffice.

In the long run, the 76ers should transform Larry Hughes into the one–spot and put Iverson where he belongs — at the two. For now, Eric Snow is filling the void, but his upside is nowhere as high as that of Hughes.

• I'm going to jump on the Darrell Armstrong bandwagon. The Orlando Magic, who sport the best record in the Eastern Conference, should give a lot of the credit to this guy that most have never heard of.

Chuck Daly cannot afford to keep this guy on the bench. Not being able to keep him on the bench makes either Nick Anderson or Anfernee "Penny" Hardaway expendable. Penny, whose contract is up at the end of the season, is not putting up the numbers that the fans in the "O–rena" are used to, and he is probably going to find himself the odd– man–out come June.

Anderson, after a few season of poor shooting (to his standards), has gotten his outside touch back. Anderson is the perfect backcourt compliment for Armstrong because he is a hard worker and is able to get open when Armstrong drives to the basket.

Anderson is a better outside shooter than Penny, but don't rule out the option of signing Penny and then trading him instead of letting a solid player get away for nothing.

• Michael Jordan surfacing again… as 50 percent owner of the Charlotte Hornets? You do the math.

• What is the Las Vegas line on the Shaquille O'Neal vs. Chris Dudley fight? On an NBC game televised in prime time, Dudley was embarrassed when Shaq dunked hard on him and proceeded to throw him to the floor to add insult to injury.

Dudley, who is not known for his body, stepped up and fired the ball at the beast we know as Shaq, hitting him in the rear end. The camera then showed a close–up of Dudley displaying his vulgar vocabulary, "*#@! you." This is a perfect example of the rugged play that the New York Knicks bring to the court every night. Latrell Sprewell? We'll let you decide about him.

Men's lax beats BC

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

On March 13, the last time the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team played at Richard F. Garber Field before yesterday, Fairfield felt John Madigan's presence, as the sophomore attackman scored two goals and contributed two assists.

In the two games that followed — at Virginia and Hofstra — Madigan was almost completely silent, with only an assist against the Flying Dutchmen to help him in the points column.

Yesterday at home against Boston College, Madigan came alive again, scoring a hat–trick and adding an assist in the 17–7 UMass win.

Madigan's first tally came with 1:21 left before halftime. He came from behind the net on the left side, dodged, jumped and fired a shot by BC goalie Anthony Cirri to give UMass a 7–1 advantage heading into the break.

"I started a little slow," Madigan said. "I just wanted to get a goal. As soon as I got one, things got rolling."

From there on out, things were rolling for the Minutemen (3–2), who were in search of a win after dropping three straight on the road.

"This is a big confidence booster. We needed something like this to get us going," said freshman midfielder Marc Morley, who opened the scoring just two minutes into the contest and finished with a pair of goals. "This is really big. I think it's going to help us out a lot."

Though Boston College (1–4) has struggled this year, it is the closest thing to an easy game UMass has on a schedule that includes Loyola, Duke, Syracuse and Virginia. But that did not mean the Minutemen were taking their intrastate rivals lightly.

"You've got to take every team seriously," Madigan said. "You can't underestimate any team."

The Eagles made that point clear in the second half, and particularly in the fourth quarter. Freshman attackman Scott Lee buried a hat trick of his own in the UMass cage in the final frame. Tyler Iewell scored once and Tom Smith twice in the fourth.

But it was clearly UMass' day. In addition to Madigan and Morley's multiple–goal outputs, sophomores Kevin Dell and Rich Kunkel notched two goals apiece. Eight other players — Jeremy Guski, Jay Negus, Mike McKeefrey, Don Little, Mike Young, Brian Tironi, Evan Page and Dusty Smith — all had one single goals for the Minutemen.

In fact, just about the only attempt that didn't hit Its mark was a shot from long–stick defenseman Bill Cullinan, who grabbed a groundball, worked his way upfield without a challenge from BC with just over six minutes left in the third quarter and was only stopped by a save from Eagle goalie Tom Gallagher.

Eagles lax on verge of demise

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

In the process of being pulverized 17–7 by the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team yesterday, the Boston College squad looked like a unit without a future, and for good reason.

Before the 1999 season commenced, 13th–year Boston College Coach Ed Moy received word from the athletic department that his team would become a club sport in four years as part of Title IX accommodations.

"They said it was a Title IX move, but these kids pay their own way to school, and I'm here part–time," a disgruntled Moy said. "They pointed to participation numbers but we happen to believe that it is not necessary to make this cut."

While the Boston College program is comparatively younger than the game's more storied institutions, It has been competing on the varsity level since 1970, and has qualified for ECAC post–season play in three of the last four seasons.

It makes the eventual demise of the team that much more upsetting considering the recent success, but right now Moy's goal is to somehow keep his team focused on what transpires on the field.

That task is made somewhat easier considering the current players are assured of finishing out their careers at Chestnut Hill.

"These young men play the game because they love it, and they strive to play it at this level," Moy said. "The current situation makes this more difficult, but we have to take care of things that we can control, and they have been very resilient in that department."

Despite the apparent team commitment to compete without distraction, the Eagles seemed to be a group without a defined direction yesterday at Garber Field.

They were sloppy in the majority of their offensive sets before making a late run in their 26th consecutive loss to UMass.

"We were beat by a better team today," Moy said after the game. "This game was not a particularly good reflection how well the guys have responded."

One of the bright spots in this time of despair for the 1–4 Eagles has been freshman attackman Scott Lee, who recorded a hat–trick against the Minutemen.

"We are playing as hard as we can as a team," Lee said. "I have been promised four years of varsity competition, and I'm here to make the most out of the experience."

The circumstances surrounding Lee and his fellow Eagles have caught the attention of Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella, who realizes the harm in losing this traditional local rival.

"This is bad for the fans and participants of the program and it's bad for college lacrosse in general," Cannella said. "As a coach, this situation concerns me and you can only hope this is not a trend in our sport."

Despite the initial decision from the BC hierarchy, which stands firmly as of now, Moy holds hope that with the help of active petitioners supporting the team, they can reverse the ruling before it's too late.

Tennis gains two wins

The Massachusetts women's tennis team swept both of its road matches over the weekend. The Minutewomen defeated Colgate and St. Bonaventure convincingly, beating Colgate by a score of 6–1 and St. Bonaventure, 9–0. The wins improved the team's spring record to 3–4.

Coach Judy Dixon was pleased with her team's performance and she credits the success to a talk she had with her squad before the Colgate match.

"I told them that we've played a lot of top–100 teams this winter," Dixon said. "And if we had played an easier schedule, we would have a lot more wins."

Dixon said that because the Minutewomen are not in the top–100, they fall into what she calls "the grey area." That "grey area" consists of teams that are in the 130–150 rankings in the Northeast.

Colgate is also one of those "grey area" schools. The win against the Big Red was a big boost for the team's morale.

"We were a better team, we just forgot how to win," Dixon said. "We didn't have to play well to win, which was a step forward for us. The match

Ward and Comeau compete

By Bryan Smith

On March 25, the Massachusetts women's outdoor track season began in sunny Gainseville, Fla. on the campus of the University of Florida. The Gators hosted the 55th Coca Cola Florida Relays.

UMass sent just two competitors down, but their showing was unmatched. Andrea Comeau and Melissa Ward placed sixth and ninth in the heptathalon, respectively.

Comeau scored 4,704 points, narrowly missing the record she set last year of 4,738. Her score was good enough to qualify her for the ECACs as well as the New England Championships.

The junior, coming off the indoor season in which she qualified for the NCAAs in the high jump, started the outdoor season on a high note. Comeau finished second in the high jump with a jump of 5–feet–5 3/4–inches. She also placed third in the 800m with a time of 2:23.41 and had a personal best of 25.78 in the 200m.

Ward ended the competition with a total of 4,223 points, a feat good enough to qualify her for the New England Championships. Her best showings were in the javelin throw, where she placed fourth with a throw of 95–feet–10– inches, and third in the shot put with a distance 35–feet–11 1/4–inches.

"We did well for early season competition," assistant coach Jim Giroux said. Giroux accompanied the Minutewomen to Gainseville in the absence of coach Julie LaFreniere.

LaFreniere is optimistic about the upcoming season, "The team is fairly healthy. We're coming off an outstanding indoor season, but hope to do better with the hammer, discus and javelin throw being added for the outdoor season," she said, "We have strong competitors in these events which will add to overall team success."

The remaining Minutewomen will begin competition on Saturday, April 3, when they travel to Hanover, N.H. for a quad–meet with host Dartmouth College, the University of Vermont and UMass–Lowell. In addition to their team meets, Comeau and Ward, along with Johanna Lelke, will head to Holy Cross on April 15th and 16th to compete in another heptathlon.

Baseball returns home after loss

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

The University of Connecticut kept its athletic winning streak alive following Monday night's dunking of the Duke men's basketball team to clinch the NCAA National Championship.

Yesterday, in a game that saw 30 total hits, the Husky baseball team downed Massachusetts, 20–14, in a more subtle manner. UConn improved to 12–9 while the Minutemen flatten out to 8–8.

North Adams St. transfer Todd Samolewicz (2–1) accepted his first loss for UMass, as Connecticut's Jeff Fulchino improved to 1–1 on the year.

Offensively, UMass jumped off to a good start with eight runs in the first inning. Connecticut return the favor with four runs in the bottom half. The Minutemen tagged on two more runs in the next two innings as UConn totaled four runs in the second inning.

In the bottom of the fourth, the Huskies again scraped up four runs to tie the game up. The early frame of the fifth inning was the last time UMass scored, adding two runs to temporarily take over the lead, 14–12.

UConn retook the lead in the fifth, slapping the Minutemen for three runs and tacking on five more in the sixth inning.

The bats were heavy and hungry as offense was clearly the bright spot for both teams. UMass freshman Mike Kulak brought home the bacon with four hits while powering in five runs. The center fielder connected for the only home run for UMass. Senior Brian Samela went 3–for–5 and drove in three runs.

First baseman Kevin O'Connell went 1–for–3 on the day, but made the most of it by adding two RBI to the cause. Other offensive highlights for UMass include second baseman Shaun Skeffington's 2–for–5 day, complete with one RBI and a triple.

Five Minutemen pitchers saw action after starter Bill Cooke was removed. The senior captain hurled two innings while allowing seven earned runs and walking two. Brian Hourigan pitched the next two innings, giving up four runs on three hits. Brian Blumsack replaced the freshman, allowing one ER on no hits and three walks.

Though Samolewicz pitched just 2/3 of the fifth inning, he picked up the loss, allowing one earned run and letting up just one walk. Sophomore David Loonie and freshman David

Lax bounces back: women to attack Brown

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (3–2) will need to stop its drought against ranked opponents when the Minutewomen travel to Providence, R.I., to square–off against No. 20 Brown University (2–3, 1–0 Ivy League) at 4 p.m. tomorrow.

The Minutewomen have struggled against ranked competition earlier this year. UMass has dropped both of its games with ranked opponents, most recently an 11–2 loss at the Carrier Dome to Syracuse and an 8–3 decision to Boston University.

The 3–2 Minutewomen need to find a way to make an impact against a ranked opponent. The lacrosse regular season is only 14 games and UMass is now under the gun to try to make Its impact during its out–of–conference schedule.

Since the Atlantic 10 does not get an automatic bid to postseason play, the Minutewomen need to make some noise against Brown, as it is one of the best teams remaining on their schedule — along with No. 9 Dartmouth College, Hofstra and A–10 foe Temple. In order to receive a bid for postseason play, they will need to run the gamut.

"Every game is critical. The next couple of weeks are critical, [especially] Brown and Dartmouth, which lead into our conference schedule. But mainly we are just looking to be competitive; 60 minutes of stability and consistency," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said.

In order for the Minutewomen to make an impact, they will need to improve their offensive production. Against Syracuse and BU they have only scored a combined five goals.

UMass will need scorers like Melissa Anderson to take more shots, as she has buried eight goals thus far this season on only 12 shots. Her shooting percentage stands at 67 percent. Noelle Gorski will also need to continue her steady play on offense, as she has tallied five goals and an assist. The Minutewomen will be looking for senior attack Laura Korutz to explode, as she currently has collected only four goals on 24 shots.

"Laura is an important player for us. We would love for Laura to have some all–star games for us, but it's more of the supporting cast [problem]. Against Syracuse, not one of the attackers scored a goal — they were waiting around watching Laura and waiting for her

God sighted in clouds Amherst takes up arms

By James Shaker
Staff infection

In a rare public appearance, God parted the clouds and showed his face above a shocked Town of Amherst.

The Lord was actually described by many to look like famous drag star RuPaul, further compounding the question "Is God male or female?"

"Sweet Jesus! Huve you ever seen a horse aroused?"

"Girlfriend," I just live my life, RuPaul said from outside the WalMart he/she manages. "Please hire me to do something useful — Rake your leaves, deflower your virgin child. Anything!"

When asked how this will affect the University community, President William Bulger looked concerned. "Where?" he asked. "UMa–whuzzits? Whatever, dude." He then returned to his sandwich, made with thinly–sliced tavern ham, provolone cheese and a little dab of mustard (mmmhhh…).

"We don't like this one bit," Hill Boss said. "Of course God comes down now and He'll say 'Oh yeah, thou canst smoke in bars' and He'll say it's in the bible, buried in Deuteronomy or something. We just don't have time for that."

Boss continued, saying he was trying to restructure the zoning laws so that Yahweh would have to pay exorbinate prices and move on. "Now He'll know how Job felt."

Angry residents, fearing God would urinate on public property "like so many other people around here," angrily shook torches and rakes at the Diety. They did so for half an hour, before their arms got tired and they decided to catch an a cappella concert at Amherst College.

Alan Hale, who played "The Skipper" on "Gilligan's Island," could not be reached for comment. He's dead.

MASSPirg sinks yet another boat in attempt to prove that crap can float

After their successful campaign to ban hatred from college campuses, MASSPirg made yet another attempt to prove that recycleables can make "keen boats."

When questioned about why they have such a hard–on for boats, representative Jack Grapes said, "Come on. We've all seen Waterworld. Oh, wait…"

So yesterday morning, the S.S. Granola, made of twigs, mud and Cherry Coke bottles, set out on the crystal blue waters on the campus pond. It sank within four minutes of leaving. All hands were lost.

Scott reacts to sheep scandal

By Golden "Darlin'" Buchanan and Bradford Pinkham
Collegian Spies

In an emergency press conference held yesterday afternoon, University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott responded to allegations that he has had sexual relations with sheep cloned at the University.

"The sheepy biologically generated here are not for use as sex objects," Scott stated. "I am not above the rules here. I have never, and will never, touch the animals in an unpure way."

Despite Scott's denial of the allegations, made one week ago by Student Government Association (SG–make believe – A) senate judiciary committee member Seth Presser, an increasing amount of evidence is being collected against him.

Said Presser: "It's a commonly known fact that Chancellor Scott is from a small farm on the Orkney Islands off the coast of Scotland. There was a rough ratio of about three people for every one farm, and it is estimated that the sheep there outnumbered the men five to two. When you've got to get your rocks off as an adolescent, you get desperate.

"And Scott was quite desperate," Presser continued. "He got shipped off to some private boys academy at the age of 10 and took to farm animals as his 'special friends.'"

Clem Bartok, a famed electromagnetic field scientist, gave a speech entitled "Feminist Ideology in Postmodern Tanzania: Why do Fools Fall in Love, Why Do Birds Sing?" in the basement of Tobin.

Nobody came.

"I can't believe nobody's here," Bartok muttered through his tears,"I made butter cookies and brought punch."

After crying for 30 minutes, Bartok lost hope.

"I don't think anyone else is gonna come. Do you want the rest of the cookies?"

Bartok and a humbled Collegian reporter drowned themselves in cookie crumbs, Hawaiian Punch, and some nips Bartok got from his plane ride over.

"I wanted to be a drummer for a heavy metal band back in Prague, but no, Mommy said be a good boy and go to University. Learn about electromagnetics and feminism. Look at my life…"

Bartok looked around the dank little basement room in Tobin.

"Is it just me, or does it smell like fried monkey brains down here?" Bartok asked.

The Collegian reporter agreed, yes, the basement of Tobin Hall did smell like monkey brains.

"I mean how worthwhile am I if not one single person at UMass wants to hear me speak," said the very drunk Czech.

"Well," said the glassy–eyed reporter, "I'm here."

The two exchanged a tender–hearted moment when they were interrupted by the door opening.

"Is this the Queen Fan Club meeting? I brought my Freddie Mercury collectible stamps so —"

"Whoa," said Bartok, "I'm talking on the Feminist— I mean, yeah, Freddie Mercury is cool."

Gordon Hardon took out his stamps and his wide array of Queen paraphanalia.

"Umm, so I like the Queen," said Bartok, "We are the champions,' alright. Does anyone have any snootchie bootchies?"

Hardon looked confused.

"You know— a doobie, a blunt, a spliff?" said Bartok, "Let's listen to some good time rock and roll music and get zonked!"

Hardon told Bartok that was not his thing.

"I don't engage in activities that alter my state of consciousness. I could lose my status in Dungeons and Dragons and lose my golden sword. I just want to talk about Queen," Hardon looked down at the floor; confused and disheartened. "This isn't really the Queen Fan Club is it? I've been duped."

Bartok sighed. "I don't suppose you want to hear about Feminist ideology in Tanzania?"

"Actually," said Hardon, "I'm a bit of a fool for Feminist ideology and Tanzania. Enlighten me."

Bartok began his talk and slowly passers–by trickled into the room. Humper Chumper, a sophomore philosophy major said he was pleased to come to the presentation.

"Yeah. It was interesting. And I'm getting credit for being here. So, yeah, cool," said Chumper.

He wasn't going to get credit.

Tinny Foyl, senior French major said, "Yes, Tanzania is interesting. I think feminists are good when they shave their armpits anyway. I also forgot to eat dinner and I smelled cookies."

The cookies were all gone.

And as for Spacey Smackford, senior Classics major, "I'm so glad I heard Bartok. I think this is the best psychology experiment I've ever volunteered for. I hope I get electric shock treatment though."

She didn't, but she did have a better understanding of feminist ideology in Tanzania.

Parking Services tows Weinermobile

By Four Star Forster
Collegian Staff

An attempt by Oscar Meyer Weiner to recruit some honest college kids looking for work resulted in a $1,000 ticket and a tow by the University of Massachusetts Parking Services.

The Weinermobile was parked outside of the Student Union, offering tours of the enourmous vehicle in all its splendor and all the free hot dogs students could eat. However, after an hour the fun came to an end when a tow truck showed up to remove the Weinmobile claiming it was in violation of parking codes.

University Parking Services press spokesperson, "Barbara" was unavailable and is said to be out to lunch until next Tuesday.

Dick Crum, the spokesman for Oscar Meyer expressed anger at what he called "an institution of absolute *&@%# lunacy!"

Crum claims he will sue Parking Services, Chancellor David K. Scott, and "your momma". although it was not clear exactly whose "momma" Crum was referring to.

It was also a fly in some student's mustard to see the Weinermobile get towed. One student, "Joe", who wished to remain annoymous for fear of ruining his chances of getting laid, showed an interest in the Oscar Meyer "weiner boy" position.

"I like weiners." said "Joe."

Another student, P. Ness Envy, a senior political science major, voiced her bewilderment at the actions of the University Parking Services. "I just don't understand. First it was here and now it's not."

Whether the Weinermobile will ever come back to the UMass campus to recruit students again has not yet been determined but a committee task force is being established by students and other disgruntled parkers to address the issue.

One Long Island student, who wishes to remain annonymous for family reasons, suggests using cement shoes for tow truck drivers. "And if that doesn't do it, I say we take a Louisville to their kneecaps 'cause they can't take away our hawtdawgs that easy." Other students feel a more indirect approach would be effective and have mentioned rocking the Parking Services trailer as a symbolic effort to, as protest management student Resa Storm says "shake some sense into them."

Tomorrow a march will be held beginning on the Student Union steps and ending at the Parking Services trailor. Students plan to sing "I Wish I Were An Oscar Meyer Weiner" in rounds. All are invited to attend.

Ghost of Chris Farley to speak at graduation

In a surprising move, beating out such living candidates as Tom Brokaw and "Crazy Dave" Messaros, UMass announced that the graduation speaker for this year would be Chris Farley.

Chris Farley, late of Saturday Night Live and the Oscar– nominated Coneheads, died almost two years ago.

"I think this is a great opportunity for the school," said Chancellor David K. Scott. "We had an opportunity to bring in a man who is, at the very least, a third–tier celebrity. Living or dead, we paid $27.50, and I expect to use the remaider of the speaker budget at Liquors 44 in the cheap aisle."

Angry students did not hold back their comments. "Shit," a usually more verbal GSS member said.

Scott continued: "Affirmative action, my ass. This is one fat bastard, and he's dead. You can't get more of a minority than that.

"Oh, I don't expect any undead voodoo mumbo–jumbo, and I certainly don't expect any Weekend at Bernie's–type tomfoolery." Scott said. "I do expect all the things that come with Chris Farley — fart jokes, obese jokes and pants ripping, but from beyond the grave, of course."

When asked what to expect, Scott said "I don't know about you, but I expect to get plenty liquored up and set off bottle rockets. If I don't pee my pants, getting out of bed won't be worth it. Yee–fuckin'–ha!"

Penis issue needs coverage

To the editor:

You have been neglecting an important issue, both off- campus and on. As you may already have guessed, I am referring to the circumcision debate.

It was a grim morning in 1976 when I became one of the foreskin-impaired. The routine mutilation that men endure in this country is a source of mental anguish for those of us who feel "attached" to that special piece of skin.

Please run a feature story soon on this hard, e... painful, er... relevant issue.

Pushkar pushed me over the edge

To the editor:

I am writing to express my angst regarding Alexis Pushkar's columns in general and "My life as a dictator" in particular. Ms. Pushkar shows a surprising lack of fashion sense in her choice of the beanie as a piece of headware. A more sophisticated and urbane columnist might have chosen a flannel stocking cap or perhaps a green knitted skull cap with a pompon. Ms. Pushkar, beanies went out with the babies and the bathwater.

I also find your use of the salami imagery reprehensible. No well-bred young woman would dare to include such a blatant phallic symbol in a piece of writing. Furthermore sausages are not the best thing to give the people you are conquering. I recommend cigarettes.

You state, "Nobody in Boston would miss Western Mass." Western Mass. people are proud of their cows and their fields and the stench that cows make in their fields.

Take that and smoke it in your bong.

Animal Rights Coalition to host dinner

Tickets for the annual fundraising dinner for the University of Massachusetts Animal Rights Coalition have gone on sale on the Campus Cneter Concourse, a spokesperson for the group said today.

"Steak and potatoes, just like John Wayne," Susan Farenstein-Kensington said. "Mmmmm... beef."

The dinner, which is the most important fund-raising tool for the under-funded, under-appreciated and under-nourished organization, will be held at the new Slaughterhouse Five Steakhouse. The menu will include steak, potatoes and apple fritters.

As a bonus, according to Farenstein-Kensington, there will be even more fun with line dancing.

To draw in more eaters, Farenstein-Kensington-Von Boehlem, who paused during the interview to get married, the Animal Rights Coalition will sponsor a raffle. Top prize in the raffle will be a new leather couch, crafted by the sweatshop workers in the UmAss Craft Center. A leather jacket courtesy of Rawhide Unlimited will also be given away.

Farenstein-Kensington-Von Boehlem, who is considering changing her name to Yusef Israel, hopes this year's dinner will be an even greater success than last year's.

"Last year it was like, here's some vegetables. Now give us money. C'mon, where's the fun in that?" she asked.

"I can't wait. This is going to be the best fundraiser ever," Walter Beans said. "I can't wait to taste the blood of that sweet animal on my tongue. I want my steak so rare, it's still mooing. And that leather couch will look great under the boar's head hanging in my living room."

Disturbing Behavior

Awful friggin' movie. But Katie Holmes is hot.

Disturbing Phone Calls

Chancellor Scott was cited for making prank calls to some "foxy ladies," and some males, on campus. He said they were "booty calls."

AT&T keeps calling my house. AT&T, get off my jock.

Health/Safety Hazards

Environmental Health and Safety was dispatched to extinguish a boat found floating ablaze in the Campus Pond. Environmental group MASSPirg pointed the finger at members of the Cannibus Reform Coalition, who smiled lazily and fell asleep.

Ugly people

An ugly person was sighted on University Drive. He was shot.

An ugly person (unrelated) was sighted near the Phi Kappa Alpha (PiKE) fraternity house. The fraternity brothers brought him in, saying he was "one of theirs."

Scott has since undergone social counseling to better deal with people.

Presser, a former chancellor of elections with the SGA, is not letting his case end there.

"Does anybody else find it strange that sheep were the first animals we were interested in cloning here at UMass?" he asked a small group of students who gathered outside the conference to protest the chancellor's use of University funds for personal gains.

Faculty Senate secretary John Bracey also spoke at yesterday's rally. "I don't get it, I just don't get it. I knew Scott was screwing over the students and administration, but to find out he's been screwing sheep? It all makes sense."

Presser also claims to have in his possession compromising photos of the University front-man with as many as six farm animals in his office — three of which were sheep.

"The thought of the existance of such photos is absurd," Scott said. "I had the door closed and the shade pulled — that and it was midnight. Nobody could possibly have gotten pictures."

In reply, Presser explains that he had political activist Dees Nuts dress up as a goat to snap the incriminating shots.

"I got the pictures in disguise," Nuts said. "I had to leave quickly when I began to think that my life, uh, sexual security was in danger."

Chief Luippold and a team of UMass police investigators recently discovered wool fragments in various spots in Scott's office, including a fistful underneath Scott's desk. Luippold said the findings are inconclusive, and refused to comment further due to the preliminary nature of the investigation.

But a source from the Hadley Farm has reported that she noticed a "peculiar yellow stain" on the pelt of a sheep known as "K."

Scott flustered when questioned about the stain and mumbled, "A mustard stain! It's mustard that dripped out from my ham sandwich during a scientific cloning presentation."

"Mustard my arse," screamed one angry social thought and political economy major. "Ham sandwich! Ha!"

Presser also reported that he has testimony from a UMass student intern who said she has she has heard moans and the words "Oh, my special K.," from the inside of Scott's third- floor Whitmore office on numerous occassions.

"At the time I thought he was really enjoying his cereal or something," she said. "But now..."

Scott refused to answer any questions as he strapped on his white sneakers and bolted from his office yesterday evening. However, when he arrived at his sleek maroon Buick LeSabre only to find it covered with rotten eggs and the words, "Clone this buddy!" he shook his head sadly and said, "But I'm president of United Way! Doesn't that count for anything?"

Chhim guilty on four charges

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Jurors deliberated for five hours yesterday before finding 18-year-old Sokha Chhim guilty of armed robbery, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, assault with a dangerous weapon and unlicensed possession of a firearm.

Chhim was not found guilty, however, of assault with intent to murder in the shooting of former University of Massachusetts engineering student Russell Bishop.

Chhim could face life imprisonment for the charge of armed robbery, but is likely to serve a reduced sentence due the not-guilty finding on the charge of attempted murder, as well as his age, background and family ties, said his attorney, Joseph Franco.

There will be some incarceration, however: the charge of unlicensed possession of a firearm carries a mandatory one- year minimum jail sentence. Sentencing will take place next Wednesday, April 7, in Greenfield.

Bishop attended the entire trial and was happy when he heard the verdict. "I think everything went well. It was a fair trial," he said in an interview yesterday following the trial. "I was happy with the outcome... I don't think he went [to Cashin Residence Hall] with intent to murder. He went with intent to rob, and it did not go as planned."

Bishop also said he had no doubt Chhim would be found guilty of the other charges. "There was so much evidence piled up against him, so many people connected to the crime."

Bishop was shot in the neck during a botched $1,100 drug transaction on the night of Oct. 3, when Chhim arrived at Bishop's Cashin dorm room to purchase four ounces of marijuana.

During testimony, Bishop admitted he had been selling marijuana from his dorm room for four months previous to the shooting. But he never thought that selling marijuana would place him in such danger. "You just don't think something like that would happen with [selling] weed."

Bishop considers himself lucky to have survived the shooting. He was rushed to Bay State Medical Center immediately after the shooting and underwent emergency surgery performed by Dr. Francis Lee. Lee testified Tuesday that the bullet entered Bishop's neck on the left side, pierced his jugular vein, grazed a vertabrae, and narrowly missed his carotid artery before exiting above his right shoulder.

Bishop spent three weeks in the hospital and one week at a rehabilitation center in Braintree. He has almost fully recovered, but Lee said the wound nearly cost Bishop his life. In his closing arguments yesterday, Assistant District Attorney David Ross suggested that Chhim had intended to do just that when he aimed at Bishop's neck.

"He didn't shoot him in the leg, he didn't shoot him in the arm, he didn't shoot a warning shot," Ross said. "If shooting him in the neck is not evidence of intent to kill, then having the gun pushed away then intentionally moving it back is."

But apparently jurors believed there was sufficient doubt to find Chhim not guilty of assault with intent to murder.

"Obviously the jury didn't believe [there was intent to kill]," Franco said yesterday in a phone interview. "There was evidence of a struggle, the gun was knocked away... unfortunately it did discharge."

Franco said Chhim "had a real concern for his parents, even more so than himself," when he learned of his fate. Chhim's parents are from Cambodia and do not speak English, Franco said. "They had relied on their son... and will suffer somewhat [as a result of his incarceration]. There are no winners here."

Franco had suggested throughout the trial that it was a case of mistaken identity. Each witness described the assailant as a 5'7" Hispanic male — Chhim is a 5'10" Asian male.

"I'm afraid this case is what we call a rush to judgement," Franco told the jury. "It's a circumstantial case. The physical evidence is not there... the [witness] credibility is not there."

Franco pointed out inconsistencies among the testimonies of several witnesses, especially Ratanak Ek, one of the initial suspects in the case, and argued that there were too many coincidences and loop-holes in the prsecution's argument to prove Chhim's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Ross also referred to coincidence in his closing statement, but countered, "The coincidences in this case are enormous. [But] I would suggest to you that when there are so many coincidences, it's no longer a coincidence. It's the truth."

Bishop says he "can't wait" to return to UMass this fall to complete his engineering degree; but he won't be living on campus. He also says he would like to thank all the students and faculty that have supported him.

"I couldn't have made it through all of this without them."

Students, community challenge privatization of Campus Center

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Staff

Students, community members and auxiliary service employees voiced deep concern and criticism of a possible move towards privitization in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center during an open forum last night.

The forum was the first in a series of three meetings designed to give the public a chance to speak to a private consulting group hired by the university to review operations primarily in the Campus Center. The consulting group will research the topic and suggest different options based on their findings. They will issue their review to university officials on April 12.

One of the concerns discussed was the effect of privitazation on student jobs on-campus.

Francis Martin, a supervisor in the Campus Center, cited the condition of student jobs at Salem State College after its services were privitized.

"At Salem State College, they run a referral service because there are no student jobs available," said Martin.

Many students were upset that jobs may be eliminated once the Campus Center is privatized.

"It's not that easy to get a job on-campus if you don't have work-study," said Carly Muzkowitz, a sophmore who works at the Bluewall.

"I can't live on 40 dollars a week. Who's going to hire me until I graduate?" said Sarah Smegal, a senior who attended the meeting.

Others argued that privatization will lead to better working conditions on campus. One proposal suggested that students job security will not be dependent on their grades.

Many questioned the purpose of the study and the origin of its initiation.

"It's fundamental that you know why the study was initiated. My suggestion is [that] a very prime factor, above all, should be the impact upon students," said Alfredo DiLascia, a business owner in Amherst and is also a board member of the local Chamber of Commerce.

"This could be too much financially driven," said DiLascia.

A few major student groups that may be affected are the student busi-

Senators say hello as the new officers are sworn-in

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association said goodbye to some old faces and hello to some new ones last night. Salwa Shamapande, who has been SGA's president for the last year, said his good-byes last night as Jeffery Howe was officially sworn in.

Although the new cabinet members have not been appointed yet, the old cabinet member term ended yesterday as well. The SGA said good-bye to Avi Khanna, Secretary of University Policy; Eleanor Gerome, Secretary of Administrative Affairs; Jesse Burchfield, Attorney General; and Brenda Fitzpatrick, Secretary of Finance. Most of them left the SGA with thank yous and words of wisdom for the future SGA.

When SGA opened the senate floor for motions to be voted on, things heated up. The first motion was to allocate $4,000 to the Stonewall Center to bring Ellen Degeneres to UMass as a speaker. After some debate and a friendly amendment suggested by Paul Ferro, commuter area senator and trustee-elect Seth Avakian agreed to amend the amount, and the motion was passed by the senate.

Much debate ensued over Title VII, the part of the SGA constitution that deals with Registered Student Organizations. Jesse Burchfield, who has spent countless hours writing it, was victorious on his last day as part of the SGA. More then a month ago, the senate sent Burchfield back to rewrite parts of Title VII. Last night, the rewritten Title VII passed, but not before Ferro had his say.

Ferro argued that adequate time had not been given to read the motion and that senators would be doing the students a grave injustice if they passed the motion without reading it. Ferro first asked that the motion be tabled until next week allowing senators a chance to review it, but the senate voted the proposition down; he then asked for a 15 minute recess for the same purpose but lost again. While arguing against Title VII, Ferro took a hand count of how many senators knew what Title VII was. Fourteen people raised their hand. "This is not a pro-student action," said Ferro.

Arguing in support of Title VII was Mike Rossettie, the Governor from Southwest. He had argued against passing Title VII last time it was brought to the floor and was the main reason it had failed. In support of passing Title VII last night Rossettie said, "You know it's good if me and Jesse agree." He also said that he and Burchfield had spent time working on it together so it could pass last night.

The last motion to pass last night had to do with Spring Concert. Khanna, who has been working on Spring Concert, asked the SGA for $10,000 from the newly-created Program Board. "Do you want a Spring Concert?" asked Khanna. Apparently the senators do, because the motion passed. Spring Concert now has an additional $10,000 to book bands with and buy other things necessary to make the concert a huge success for everyone.

Resource Network hosts admissions talk

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

The Resource Network, joining the growing ranks of individuals discussing the recent revisions to the admissions policy, met yesterday to get the facts straight and the truth out about the issue.

The group, which included about 30 Network members and other faculty, staff and students, discussed problems surrounding the issue, its legal foundation, and problems of recruiting and retaining Asian, Latino/a, African and Native American (ALANA) students.

Admissions practices at the University of Massachusetts were changed last month, no longer making race a priority in admissions, as influenced by the court decision against a Boston public high school, Boston Latin.

Boston Latin was accused of using race as a major factor in admissions and violating the Bakke decision in California that stated race could only be used as one of several factors in deciding admissions.

But some individuals attending the forum felt that whether it's legal or not, the University should look out for students' best interests.

"We can do what's legal, but what's right is a lot tougher," said Mike Jenkins, assistant athletic director for Student Affairs. "I'm tired of it. I'm really tired of hearing all the things we can't do, [limited by] what's legal... It's about time to do things because they're right."

The legal entanglements surrounding the issue were addressed during the forum by David Schimmel, a professor of education who teaches a class about education and law.

Kosovo concentration camps reported by refugees, German defense minister

By Patrick Quinn
Associated Press

BLACE, Macedonia — Thousands more refugees streamed out of the embattled Serbian province of Kosovo Wednesday, some saying Serb police burned their homes, herded them into trains and shipped them off to neighboring Macedonia.

Germany's defense minister said there were reports that Yugoslav forces have been killing or locking up ethnic Albanian men and teenage boys in concentration camps.

The United States approved $50 million in urgent new aid to the refugees, which included the first significant numbers from Kosovo's capital, Pristina. Their accounts were similar to those told by people fleeing other parts of the province in Serbia, the main Yugoslav republic.

"Yesterday, like cattle we were put on the street. We didn't know where to go. We left the house open and nothing is there now," said Sabri Hajzeri, 30, an artist from Pristina.

With international monitors gone and virtually all foreign journalists kicked out of Kosovo, the refugees' claims were impossible to verify.

Yugoslavia's U.N. representative, Vladislav Jovanovic, denied on CNN that Serbs were forcing ethnic Albanians to leave Kosovo and accused NATO of manufacturing an artificial human catastrophe because it is losing support for the bombing campaign.

A report Tuesday from Germany said ethnic Albanian leader Ibrahim Rugova had been injured and had gone into hiding. However, Serb authorities on Wednesday allowed a small group of interviewers to see Rugova at his Pristina home.

"I've been here for eight days after my return from Paris [peace talks] with my family. I would like to say only that I am alive," Rugova said.

Since the bombing began a week ago, at least 118,000 people have fled Kosovo, most of them to Albania, NATO said yesterday. Macedonia, which had been blocking entry by many Kosovo refugees, finally relented and allowed about 8,000 people to cross the northern border yesterday as international officials scrambled to set up emergency reception centers.

The Clinton administration offered $50 million in food and supplies that will be delivered by U.S. military airlift.

In addition to those in Macedonia, thousands more fled into Albania and the Yugoslav republic of Montenegro, although officials in both places said it was impossible to provide an accurate count. In Washington, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin, citing refugee reports, said Serb forces may have expelled up to 50,000 ethnic Albanians from the southwestern town of Pec and then burned and looted shops and homes throughout the city.

German Defense Minister Rudolf Scharping said there was growing evidence that Yugoslav forces have set up concentration camps in Kosovo for ethnic Albanian men and teen-age boys. He gave no details but indicated NATO was trying to confirm their existence. None of the Pristina refugees interviewed on the Albanian border said they had firsthand information about "concentration camps" but several claimed they had heard rumors of them.

At a border crossing inside Macedonia at Blace, two trainloads of Kosovo refugees camped out yesterday and hundreds of other ethnic Albanians were entering by car and foot.

The newcomers joined about 14,000 other Kosovo Albanians whom the United Nations estimates had already entered Macedonia, a former Yugoslav republic, since NATO air attacks began March 24. Some had spent more than a day in the no-man's land separating Yugoslavia and Macedonia. They claimed Serb police torched their homes, packed them into a train for Macedonia.

"I left [my neighborhood] while my house was still burning," said Selvete Gujunovsci, 28, a mother of two.

In the Albanian capital Tirana, the army, aided by the International Red Cross, began setting up a tent city for about 2,000 Kosovo refugees brought there from the border in the last few days. Albanian soldiers were distributing clothing, but some refugees complained that there were only six toilets for hundreds of people.

CBS's Dan Rather wins sit-down interview with Clinton

NEW YORK (AP) — CBS and Dan Rather won a major coup with yesterday's 70-minute interview of President Clinton.

Clinton had not sat down for a television interview since he spoke with Black Entertainment Television's Tavis Smiley in November. Clinton talked to PBS's Jim Lehrer more than a year ago, right after news of the Monica Lewinsky scandal broke.

CBS had requested the interview for several months through letters from Rather and phone calls. Finally, Tuesday night, White House press secretary Joseph Lockhart called to say Clinton would talk to Rather the next afternoon at the White House.

CBS immediately set aside portions of the "CBS Evening News" yesterday and "60 Minutes II" in prime-time to air the interview.

Half of "60 Minutes II" was devoted to the interview. Clinton spoke about Kosovo for half of the show and other topics for the rest.

Rather was subdued, nearly whispering. The name Monica Lewinsky was never uttered, although Rather asked Clinton what he believed was the moral of the impeachment episode and what children should be told about it.

The veteran CBS anchorman made the president laugh in asking whether Clinton could fulfill the responsibility of a U.S. senator's husband. It gave Rather an opening to ask subtly, about whether there were any marital problems in the First Family. "You expect to do that together, as man and wife?" he asked. Clinton said he did, if his wife chose to run for the Senate. In an earlier interview with The Associated Press, Rather said he believed the president talked because he felt the American people needed more explanation of the NATO bombing campaign in Yugoslavia.

CBS's evening news program could use the boost, as its ratings have been sinking lately.

Schimmel explained what might happen if the University were to be taken to court for using race as a major factor in admissions.

He said assuming the former admissions practices were problematic, UMass could have been brought to court, probably by a conservative right wing group, for violating the Bakke decision.

One such group, the Center for Equal Opportunities (CEO), which is investigating state schools admissions policies in regards to affirmative action, requested information from UMass in July.

Speaking in hypotheticals, Schimmel said if UMass won the initial case, those who brought the suit would probably appeal it to the United States circuit court. Then if the circuit court's decision supported making race a priority in admissions, UMass would win again.

This would contradict a decision in the fifth U.S. circuit court, which encompasses five states in the south, that said race may not be used in any way in admissions.

This contradiction between the two U.S. circuit courts would mean if UMass won and the losing party appealed the decision in the circuit court, the U.S. Supreme Court would probably accept the case hypothetically.

But Schimmer said that due to the current conservative nature of the Supreme Court, UMass probably risks losing the case and the fifth circuit court's decision would be upheld. This would mean that race could not be used in any way in admissions.

Schimmel said based on that scenario, the university should try to work within the confines of the Bakke decision which he said was "flexible" and feels the university can still achieve diversity in enrollment under the Bakke decision.

But besides explaining the issue's legal details, members of the group addressed problems ranging from ALANA student recruitment to poor communication about changing the admissions policy.

Several members of the group expressed dissatisfaction that the decision to change the policy was made "behind closed doors."

"The campus is always operating in crisis mode. We wait until people are emotional [before acting]," said Joyce Vincent, a staff member who came to the forum to hear for herself the debate surrounding the issue. "The old policy has never been presented. The new policy has never been presented. [The administration should] get [the issues] on the table for people so people make decisions together."

The group also discussed reasons ALANA students would not come to UMass. Some cited financial aid packages that don't compete with other schools as a reason.

Tom Coish, staff attorney for Student Legal Services, said ALANA students may not come to UMass because of the perception that it is a racist institution.

"There is a real question of [dedication] to diversity that I believe is founded," Coish said.

Gary Bernhard, a member of the steering committee of the Resource Network and director of University Without Walls, said the forum went well and he hopes to have more people come to the next one, which is scheduled at noon on April 14 in the Campus Center.

"It was a terrific forum. We had very knowledgeable people," Bernhard said. "We've got to have a bigger base group working on this issue."

After all the problems and questions were raised in the meeting, Jenkins summed up the situation.

"This is not a legal issue. It's a human issue," Jenkins said.

Small–town pocketbooks drained by big–time crimes

By Stephen K. Paulson
Associated Press

LARAMIE, Wyo. — Small towns are finding that the price of justice for mega-trials isn't cheap, and taxpayers are bearing the brunt of it.

Taxpayers have to pay the costs of prosecuting offenders, and in many cases where those on trial can't afford lawyers, the public also has to the pay for the defense. That can force small communities like Laramie and Jasper, Texas, to raise taxes or consider cutting services.

In Laramie, where the trial of Russell Henderson is under way in the beating death of gay college student Matthew Shepard, Albany County departments are facing a 10 percent budget cut. Social service agencies could lose more than $100,000 unless the county can come up with a way to pay for prosecuting and defending Henderson and co-defendant Aaron McKinney.

The first phase of jury selection in Henderson's trial concluded yesterday with the selection of 47 prospects, who will undergo a final round of questioning Monday.

In Jasper, Texas, Jasper County Judge Joe Folk, who is also the county's chief executive, said it will take county taxpayers three years to pay for prosecuting two defendants in the dragging death of a black man, and three other pending capital cases.

This can bankrupt small counties. Some county judges have said they won't prosecute some capital murder cases and will go for just murder because of the cost of a trial," Folk said.

Jasper County residents already have been hit with a 12 percent property tax increase to pay for the first dragging death trial, which cost $204,000, Folk said. No price tags have been set on the Laramie trials.

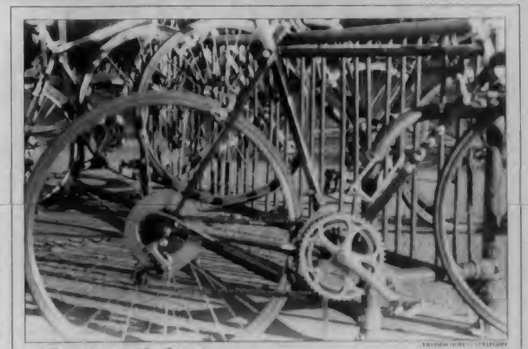
Larry Pozner, president of the National Association of Defense Lawyers, said larger communities like Los Angeles are better able to absorb the costs of prosecuting someone like O.J. Simpson.

"A big case in a small community can be prohibitive," Pozner said. "But you have to make the communities responsible for prosecution. If you just gave them access to the state budget, everyone would want to do show trials."

Some areas have already seen the need for relief for small towns or counties. The Nebraska Legislature in 1996 passed a bill that, among other things, set aside money to help small counties pay for high-profile trials.

The bill was introduced after Richardson County was financially drained by two high-profile murder cases.

Mid-size communities like Boulder, Colo., can become burdened, too.



Before this year, the city spent $1.2 million investigating the slaying of JonBenet Ramsey, and the district attorney spent an additional $400,000. No one has even been arrested.

Four NYPD cops indicted for second–degree murder

By Donna De La Cruz
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Four white police officers were charged with murder yesterday for killing an unarmed African immigrant in a hail of 41 bullets — a shooting that has led to months of protests and a painful examination of police tactics and race relations.

Officers Kenneth Boss, Sean Carroll, Edward McMellon and Richard Murphy pleaded innocent in a Bronx courtroom to second-degree murder. They could get 25 years to life in prison on the murder charges.

Amadou Diallo, a 22-year-old street vendor from Guinea with no criminal record, was shot 19 times Feb. 4 in his vestibule by members of an elite street-crime unit looking for a rape suspect. Through their lawyers, the officers have said they thought Diallo had a gun.

The slaying has frayed Mayor Rudolph Giuliani's already strained relationship with the black community, and many have accused him of failing to understand the depth of New Yorkers' anger.

Giuliani said yesterday: "We should allow the criminal justice system to now operate."

Judge John P. Collins set bail at $100,000 for each officer, even though District Attorney Robert Johnson had asked that they be held without bail. The officers left the courthouse together shortly after the arraignment.

Johnson told the judge: "On Feb. 4 in the vestibule in his own building, Amadou Diallo stood blameless, unarmed and defenseless when 19 of 41 shots were fired at him, struck him and killed him... These four defendants intended to take his life."

After leaving court, one of the officers, Carroll, shook hands with supporters and said in a quivering voice, "I want to thank the New York City police officers and the Street Crime Unit for their undaunted support."

The officers were immediately suspended from their jobs. Mathyn Kornberg, Carroll's lawyer, called the intentional murder count "ludicrous."

"What's the district attorney saying? That they had nothing to do that night but roll up on an individual and attempt to kill him because he's black?" the lawyer asked.

Steven Brounstein, Boss's attorney, said in court that Johnson had "succumbed to a political agenda. My client is innocent of all charges. There was no crime on Feb. 4."

In the two months since Diallo was killed, 1,203 people have been arrested in demonstrations over Diallo's death, the alleged police torture of Haitian immigrant Abner Louima in 1997 and the perception that law-abiding minorities are routinely humiliated by police stop-and-search tactics.

Off-duty police officers and more than 25 of Diallo's friends and relatives packed the small courtroom for the 45-minute arraignment. About 1,000 demonstrators stood outside the courthouse.

Privatization, perhaps

UMass President William Bulger has commissioned a group of consultants to determine the feasibility of campus privatization, by collecting and analyzing data. If they decide that keeping existing campus operations would be the preferred course of action, they will make recommendations for improvements in them.

Privatization would mean the end of UMass Food Services (Hatch, Bluewall, Coffee Shop, possibly Catering), the University Store, the Textbook Annex, and other campus–run operations. In their place, corporate, branded enterprises would spring up to take advantage of the captive student market. Among the choices are such names as Barnes & Noble, McDonald's, Taco Bell and other such businesses.

The fundamental difference between theee businesses and the existing services is in mission. Campus–run operations share the educational mission of the University, which gives them priorities besides making a profit. Outside businesses have no mandate to focus on anything but increasing shareholder value.

The main problems created by the conflict between educational and business goals are two-fold.

Accountability. These businesses may not be directly accountable to the University. They will not be able to respond quickly to the demand of such a small market. In addition, should there be a student complaint or liability issue, the University will not have control over it. The Student Government Association will not have jurisdiction over the big–name businesses. However, all of these things could be written into business contracts.

Student businesses, invaluable teaching tools, may suffer. At this time, UMass has a diverse array of student–operated businesses, from a sub shop to a bike co–op. Because these businesses share the educational mission of the existing Campus Center business, they need not worry about direct competition from them. With careful selection of companies, and specific anti–competitive conditions written into the contracts, it might be possible to preserve the student business, intact.

In addition to these caveats, financial aid may be affected by privatization. For–profit businesses cannot hire work– study students. For this reason any contract should stipulate that no jobs may be lost. The consultants must thoroughly evaluate whether any legal steps could be taken to enable the companies to hire work–study students.

If a significant majority of students want, say, McDonald's on campus (why?), if they want the Campus Center to resemble a generic shopping mall, these things are possible. Perhaps, if privatization is deemed suitable for campus by the independent consultants, it could be a positive change. However, in drawing up each business contract, University administrators must include strict provisions to protect the interests of students as consumers, and the interests of student businesses as competitors.

If the corporations desire to exploit UMass' captive market, they must submit to the educational mission of the University. We cannot afford to sell out our educational opportunities.

Boston-Latin case: Legalizing hate

Both the sides involved in the current struggle over changes in admission policies at UMass have been citing the Boston–Latin high school case. What is the truth of the matter? Boston city public schools underwent significant transformation in 1974 due to violent protests by civil rights activists. They had to change the admissions system that segregated applicants along race lines to encourage the admission of more black and Hispanic students. Mr. Garrity Jr., a judge ruling over this decision in 1974 ordered the desegregation of the system in 1974 and 35 percent of the admission was set aside for Black and Hispanic students in 1976.

Boston-Latin High School followed suit and changed its admissions policies to promote student diversity on the campus. Though the school did not have to stick to the above mentioned system after 1987, following a federal appeals court case that vacated court orders regarding student assignments in Boston schools, the school decided not to change its policies. In 1996, in response to a case filed by a prospective student's father, the same judge, Mr. Garrity Jr., who had earlier ordered the desegregation of the system, asked the Boston–Latin School to admit a student in violation of the school's pro-affirmative action policies.

In response to the court ruling, Boston-Latin changed its admissions policies. From 1996, they decided to make an initial qualified applicant pool. From this pool, they would select the first 50 percent based solely on entrance exam scores and grade point average. The remaining half would be weighted by race, based on the racial make-up of the entire applicant pool. That means if 15 percent of the applicants are black, 15 percent of the admitted students must also be black. The notable thing about this new policy is that while it tries to promote diversity and correct injustices done to people from certain communities, it is not strictly a quota system. This policy was defended on the very reasonable grounds that countering the lingering effects of past discrimination was absolutely part of the objectives of the public schooling system.

In 1998 there was a fresh lawsuit filed against this watered–down affirmative action admissions policies of the high school. In May 1998, a federal judge, Joseph Tauro, ruled that the Boston–Latin School Committee can consider race as a factor when deciding which students will be accepted to the school. The same lawyer who had earlier sued the school when his daughter was not admitted in 1996 took up the case again and appealed to a higher court — the first U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. This time, in November 1998, the court ruled that the admissions policy in Boston-Latin school was partially race-based and that it had to be dismantled in favor of a no-discrimination (!) policy.

No-discrimination here means that in the democracy that we live in where everybody is equal before the law, past discrimination is simply wished away. The high school went through a round of consultations with the NAACP and U.S. Department of Education and finally decided not to appeal the case in the Supreme Court.

The crucial thing to note about the present status of the case is that the latest ruling is just one more in a series of rulings and it is not the "final outcome." It sets no precedent for UMass or any other public institution. This precedent is to be seen along with many other precedents that supported goals such as promoting diversity. Look at the inconsistencies as this case unraveled— the same judge, Mr. Garrity Jr., orders the desegregation of the school-

"Has racial inequality simply vanished or has it been influenced by a general climate of hatred against the minorities and the underprivileged?"

ing system in 1974 and revokes his own decision in 1996. Has racial inequality simply vanished or has it been influenced by a general climate of hatred against the minorities and the underprivileged?

The district court rules differently from the federal court. The judiciary itself seems to be in a state of confusion regarding the affirmative action policies. However, Boston-Latin's decision not to appeal the case reflects how, from the highest echelons, there is a crackdown on lower courts for upholding some values that this country purportedly stands for — promoting diversity, racial equality and equal opportunity to everybody regardless of their skin color, gender, or income. This is the time when a grassroots struggle — one that recognizes the gross inequalities that still persist in this society — can counter the legalizing of hate from above that is permeating the entire system.

Nothing gained in Kosovo?

Paul Teves

The bombing continues in Kosovo. Meanwhile, Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic continues his ethnic cleansing of ethnic Albanians from the province of Kosovo. So has the bombing had its effect? Apparently, it has. You've probably seen the photos of the bombed–out secret police headquarters and military headquarters. But the liberal hippies in this country have taken just enough time to lift their heads from the bongs to say, "We shouldn't be in there," without having any clue as to what is actually occurring there.

The informed citizen knows that President Bill Clinton is doing the right thing, supporting and involving himself with NATO air strikes. The biggest clue to that is that even Republican leaders have shown their support of the President's decision.

Each candidate for president has made a statement with regards to the Kosovo air strikes, most in support of the presidential decision.

The leading Republican candidate for president, George W. Bush, stated clearly that he wasn't second–guessing the president's decision, but that he shared the misgivings and concerns of many Texans and Americans.

"We must have a clear, clear mission and an achievable goal," said Bush. "We must also have a good exit strategy."

Elizabeth Dole said that she was in complete support of the air strikes. Her husband, former U.S. Senator Bob Dole was on a special envoy to Kosovo for President Clinton.

"I believe that this action can be instrumental in forging a peaceful solution to a dangerous, escalating military conflict. Therefore I support it," Dole said.

She makes a good point. This is an escalating problem. If it isn't taken care of right now, it could be detrimental not only to the United States and Europe, but most importantly to the ethnic Albanians in Kosovo who have been forced by the Serbian army to leave their homes. Other have been killed on the spot, while others have been separated from their families as they are being forced to exit from Kosovo into Albania and Macedonia.

The evidence of the atrocities that occurred have been broadcast on American television on CNN. The most horrifying of these atrocities was one report of several ethnic Albanian school teachers being slaughtered execution–style in front of their students. If these are not signs of a Holocaust–type cleansing that justifies intervention, then there will never be a justified reason for sending troops to take care of a crazy dictator.

Democratic candidate for President, and current Vice President Al Gore said of the situation in Kosovo, "If Milosevic does not call off his attacks and stop the slaughter of innocent men, women and children, we are determined to act to diminish the power that he has turned ruthlessly against the Kosovo people and to help the Kosovo–Albanians win the safety, security and self–government that they deserve."

That says a mouthful about what needs to be done. Candidates like Pat Buchanan have been talking about the Kosovo situation.

"America has no vital interest in whose flag flies over the Kosovo Capital," Buchanan said. But Buchanan is obviously oblivious to the world around him and the statements he made identify why he should never hold so much as a city council seat in this great country of ours.

How a politician can be so indifferent to innocent people being slaughtered is beyond me.

Finally, the air strikes have begun to gain momentum in the United States, as slight as it might be. Support for air strikes stands at 53 percent in favor of the air strikes in a poll conducted by Newsweek magazine. Although the support for air strikes should be overwhelming, it is not. Since NATO has reported no NATO casualties in the Balkans, and the risk is very small, people should be supporting air strikes.

The next obvious problem for Clinton is whether or not he should send ground troops into the Balkans to support NATO's effort. This is an option that I can understand people worrying about, but if in fact NATO doesn't take a stand against Milosevic to stop Serbian atrocities in Kosovo itself, then the bombing might be worthless.

This is an operation which has no end unless there is a direct agreement from Milosevic that he will give Kosovo its autonomy. But according to Russian leaders who went into meet with Milosevic recently, he doesn't want to give Kosovo its autonomy but will allow refugees back.

For those of you out there who are anti–war Democrats and hippies and whatnot, maybe you should watch CNN or Headline News every once in a while and see what is really happening.

Tuesday CNN did an interview with a 16–year–old girl who barely spoke enough English to explain what was going on, but she conveyed her message clearly: "They told us to get out. If you don't 'we will kill you.'" Just imagine being 16–years–old and having your little brother screaming for his life, and think about that the next time you think we shouldn't be in Kosovo.

E–ster stories

All right, I've got one story about a family who cooks all of their Easter dinners with Ecstasy and another about a bloodsucking, homeless drunk. They may both sound completely far–fetched and outlandish, but one of them is actually true. In the spirit of April Fool's Day I'm not going to tell you which one is true. That is for you to figure out.

Let's start with the bloodsucking, homeless drunk from my hometown of Stylfeer, New Hampshire. His name was Samuel Redelic. Sam was a popular guy around town. When he was 25 his parents passed away and left him a fortune. Instead of leaving town and living lavishly in some exotic place Sam decided to stay right in Stylfeer. He wanted to give back to the community that had been so supportive during his time of need.

Now that his parents were gone the only other thing in life that Sam really loved was bowling. Because of this he built one of the most luxurious bowling alleys ever right on Main Street in Stylfeer, and founded the bowling club at Stylfeer Regional High School. A lot of kids joined that club and under Sam's leadership they achieved varsity team status in just two years.

Only a few years later Sam was on the verge of realizing his dream. His bowling team was competing for the New Hampshire State Bowling Championship against Dover High. The match was a slaughter. Sam had just coached his team too well for them to lose such a big match. However, even though it was one of the greatest nights in my town's and Sam's lives it was also the night of his downfall.

After the victory Sam invited the boys and girls teams back to his mansion. The party ended up getting a little out–of–control and some alcoholic beverages were consumed. Within a few days the entire town knew that bowling balls weren't the only things that Sam had his hands all over. It turns out that in the wee hours of the morning Sam, a man of 35 years, had engaged in sexual relations with a few of the girls on the State Championship Team.

There was an ugly trial to follow. The entire town turned their back on Sam. He spent most of his fortune on the court defense. He served six months in prison and then vanished. Right around the time that he got out of jail there was a wave of gruesome murders around the Stylfeer area. All of the victims were drunken men who were last seen stumbling out of local bars. The area was in terror and nobody knew what was really going on. Then the night of December 17, 1987 occurred. It was on this night that Sam Redelic was found to be the serial killer everyone had been looking for. He was caught in the act of slitting a man's throat as he walked out of Peggy's Bar and Grill.

It turns out that when Sam got out of prison he spent every last penny on liquor. He became a full–blown alcoholic. Then before he knew it he ran out of money to buy booze. He figured that the only way he would be able to get drunk without stealing (that was against his ways) was to slit the throats of drunk men and suck their "over the legal limit blood." It worked — so he made a habit out of it and before he knew it he became one of the most notorious drunken serial killers in history. He is now on death row.

My next story took place in my hometown, Watchully, R.I., in April, 1996. During this month my town was rocked by one of the greatest controversies the state had ever seen. A family with the last name Dukaro was known fairly well throughout Watchully. Mr. Dukaro was a dentist in town and his wife was an interior designer. They had three children who all went to my school. Their names were Lenny, Tom and Lisa. They were twelve, fourteen and seventeen respectively when the event that shook Watchully to the ground occurred.

Dan Viens

The controversy started when Lisa told her best friend Julie, my ex–girlfriend, one of her family's deepest secrets. Julie thought the secret was so bizarre that she told her parents, they called the police then the cops called the Department of Social Services. The very next day all three of the Dukaros were living in a foster home.

The deep, dark, Dukaro secret that Lisa told Julie was that every Easter Mrs. Dukaro cooks her famous raisin sauce with five pills of Ecstasy. Julie then understood why the card she got from the Dukaro's said "Happy E–ster." What you have to understand is that the Dukaros met on Easter Eve 1973 in a New York club while they were both on Ecstasy. They fell in love immediately and were married two days later. For the next bunch of years they recreated that night on the same date, but then when they had kids they decided to get them involved and do it all together on E–ster. This way the kids wouldn't be up late the night before Easter or anything.

By the Dukaros doing Ecstasy together was a way to explore and feel their familial love. They would all hug each other and roll around on the carpet. Then they would dump gravy all over themselves, sit in the Jacuzzi and have the best family day of the year.

The state of Rhode Island did not see this as exploring familial love. They took the kids away and within three weeks they were all adopted by families in New York and Connecticut. The Dukaros each did a few months in prison and upon release moved to Amsterdam. So much for living in a free country.

Well there are my two stories. A family on E and a drunk vampire murderer. Which one is true? You be the judge.

Porn jobs blow

While hot, wet, mind–blowing sex with multiple large–breasted women, at the same time (with some other kinky stuff thrown in) is everyone's sexual fantasy — or at least this is what we would be led to believe by watching any one of the millions of porn movies produced each year — there is also a more insidious side to this orgasmic frolicking that most patrons of the industry seem to ignore.

Emily Trask

For women physically and psychologically, pornography can be very damaging. On a superficial level, the overwhelming majority of all types of pornography are geared towards men, except for a few shabby attempts at capturing women's sexuality as in Playgirl.

Porn for women? Not really

I've seen porn sites before. You know why? Slow beginning, strong finish for Blur

By Matthew Nixon
Collegian Staff

13
Blur
Virgin

First things first: The lead single, "Tender," is a dud. Blur enlists the services of a gospel choir and a dreadful, almost "Give Peace A Chance" arrangement takes up the first seven minutes of the band's latest album. Lead singer Damon Albarn repeats "I'm waiting for that feeling" over and over again. The listener waits for the song to end.

How things change! There had to be a single, something ground-breaking for the band perhaps. "Tender" fits the bill. 13 is a real departure for the band and sounds nothing like the lead track or anything the band has done before. The days of "There's No Other Way," "Girls and Boys" and even "Song 2" are long gone. The band hooks up with producer William Orbit (Madonna's Ray of Light) and goes murky on us. The sound is dark, even experimental at times.

"Bugman" gets things going after the opener. Fuzzy guitars compliment Albarn's spitting out of the words in a Cockney accent. Albarn has developed a Bono-like falsetto and adds the great line "space is the place" as the song begins to fade away.

"Coffee & TV" is one of the album's highlights. This strummed ditty has Albarn singing "I've seen so much I'm going blind" and asking someone to marry him and save him from a cruel world. A cruel world, indeed. Albarn's recent breakup with lustine Frischmann of Elastica has given the man much to write about. To keep the album to 13 tracks the first of three instrumentals pops up at the end of "Coffee & TV." They echo the set up of one of the band's previous albums, Parklife.

"Swamp Song" is a modern blues number, complete with slide guitar and processed vocals. Albarn sputters out: "Give me good times/ Give me saliva." "1992" slows things down and suggests that maybe the band have been listening to Air's Moon Safari. There is keyboard aplenty before it breaks down into a freeform piece.

"B.L.U.R.E.M.I." is a playful rocker with the line: "Confusing a loop of another pop group." Another instrumental floats by before "Battle" kicks in. The basslines are heavy and the drumming takes center stage. The band recruited an additional drummer just for this track.

"Mellow Song" comes next. It starts out as the title suggests with Albarn singing over acoustic guitar and light organ accompaniment. It soon transforms into an extended instrumental piece with a droning bass line. "Trailerpark" could be the favorite. The band self-produced this one and come up with something that has Albarn sounding like The Fall's Mark E. Smith at times. The words "I lost my girl to the Rolling Stones" are heard over and over.

A fantastic track suggestive of The Doors follows. The seven minute "Caramel" has a catchy chorus sung in falsetto while all kinds of sounds and effects swirl around. It closes with the sounds of a scratchy recording of an organ and what sounds like a car starting before the acoustic beginnings of "Trimm Trabb" lead into a heavy guitar solo and more vocal processing. A rather sad song follows. "No Distance Left To Run" has Albarn telling the world about a relationship (the relationship?) that has come to an end. An organ-filled instrumental ("Optigan 1") that has become a trademark of the band brings the album to a close.

Not only is 13 the number of tracks on the disc, it is also the name of the band's recording studio, an artistic take on the letter "B" and an unlucky number. Blur take a bold step in a new direction with this one. There are no pictures of the band or lyrics to the songs. it is all about the music. Blur have created one of the year's must-have discs and in the process become pop music's newest innovators. A–

"Kid" Jordan & Anderson to play at Bezanson tonight

Following the trumpeting success of last month's Reggie Workman concert, the Magic Triangle Concert Jazz Series continues its run this semester with a performance by the "Kid" Jordan/Fred Anderson Quartet in Bezanson Recital Hall at 8 p.m. tonight.

Sponsored by WMUA and Residential Arts, the Magic Triangle Series is now in its tenth season, having grown considerably since its start in Hampden Theatre in 1990.

Making their first appearance in New England, Jordan and Anderson are legendary giants of the tenor saxophone. Jordan has spend most of his professional life in New Orleans, teaching at Southern University for 40 years, and directing the Heritage School of Music Band and Louis "Satchmo" Armstrong Jazz Camp. Mr. Jordan belongs to an incredibly talented musical family which includes trumpeter Marlon, flutist Kent and vocalist Stephanie.

Anderson was also Southern bred, having been born in Louisiana in 1929. He is a founding member of Chicago's Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians (AACM.) Anderson has been reluctant to tour but has formed a national reputation through recent CD releases.

The Quartet also features William Parker on bass and Hamid Drake on drums. Both acclaimed artists have worked with the likes of Cecil Taylor, Roscoe Mitchell, John Zorn, Marilyn Crispell, Borah Bergman, and the late Don Cherry.

The next Magic Triangle series concert takes place on April 29 and features the Andrew Hill Sextet.

Tickets for the show are $6 for students and $9 for the general public. Call 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS for more information.

Howard the star of ED TV

Truman–like film less bold, more funny

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

ED TV
Directed by Ron Howard with Matthew McConaughey, Jenna Elfman, Ellen DeGeneres
Playing at Mountain Farms Cinemas

If you saw the commercial for Ed TV and wondered why they were making a sequel to The Truman Show, you are not alone. Ed TV has a nearly identical premise: a life lived under the constant scrutiny of television cameras. Where the sublimely weird Truman Show used the premise as a jumping off point for philosophical questions about our relationship with the media, Ed TV comes from a much lower angle, choosing to satirize the family tragi-comedy that dominates the talk show airwaves. Talk shows are perhaps the easiest target for satire in America today, and director Ron Howard and company hit all the obvious points.

The entire arc of the movie is predictable. Our hero Ed (Matthew McConaughey) at first enjoys the attention of round-the-clock cameras, but hates it when his lack of privacy compromises his relationships with his loved ones. Then he leads a crusade against "the man" to reclaim his life. The moviemakers want us to be ashamed of the way television uses the emotional and personal turmoil of its characters to keep viewers interested, but he puts his characters through all the typical difficulties (a love triangle, a lost father, a sex-crazed mother) to push his plot along. Either director Ron Howard is commenting on the media's construction of stories in an incredibly self-awrre way, which seems sort of silly in such a straightforward movie, or he's using the same techniques he's trying to condemn. Strangely enough, although the movie has its thoughts all tangled and never says anything particularly brave or interesting, it's actually quite entertaining.

Jenna Elfman brings a quirky cuteness to a nothing "nice girlfriend" role, and lead Matthew McConaughey turns in his first solid star performance. Up until now, he's had two modes of acting: over-the-top sweet voiced redneck, as in Dazed and Confused, or bland poser, as in A Time to Kill. In Ed TV, he relaxes and finds a middle ground. Instead of movie star or good ole boy, he comes across as a goofy, likable guy, the kind you'd want as your cousin.

And although director Howard may not have many interesting ideas, he has an incredible gift for narrative. The movie moves beautifully and forcefully, like a brand new train on newly oiled tracks. He keeps the story lively by sprinkling it with flourishes of camera tricks with mirrors and video as well as with solid comic touches from people like Ellen DeGeneres and Martin Landau. Howard may not have much to say, but he can certainly hold your attention saying it B–

New TV sitcoms prepare to air

With today's television so dependent upon drama series, and real-life situations, it has become increasingly more difficult to find high quality sitcoms anymore. As the decade comes to a close, it seems like it will be the first time in forty years that TV will not be as contingent on its comedy series as it has been in the past. At the beginning of the 1990's, entertainment revolved around shows such as "Cheers," "The Cosby Show," "Roseanne," and "Seinfeld." Unfortunately, there will be no such trend in the 21st century, since all of those shows have vanished. However, there are some series that are still going strong and making us laugh when humor is the key to ending a long day.

If confronted with the question of "What series has won more Emmy awards in the 90's than any other?" The answer is "Fraiser." The "Cheers" spin-off starring Kelsey Grammer has won five consecutive "Best Comedy Series" awards starting in 1993. Despite some serious personal problems in the show's five year run, which mostly involved Grammer, "Fraiser" has gained a huge audience, and after being moved to the time slot last held by "Seinfeld," now usually finishes in third place in the ratings war every week, losing only to "ER" and "Friends." "Fraiser" has been a constant among television's elite. The stupendous cast, which includes David Hyde Pierce and Jane Leeves, has propelled the show to become one of the most successful comedy series in history. It doesn't seem that there will be any change in "Fraiser's" push forward. All of its stars seem to enjoy their jobs, and enjoy the fame that goes along with it.

A show that once was considered as television's elite is "Home Improvement." Tim Allen's wit, mixed with the excellent acting of Patricia Richardson seemed to be the perfect combination. Five years ago, the world couldn't get enough of Tim the tool man, but unfortunately for him, times change. The show has been dragging along in its past three seasons, and could not have received any worse news, when Jonathan Taylor Thomas announced he was leaving the show last summer.

The simplest element that "Home Improvement" used to be good for was a quick laugh. Anyone who's seen the show in the past few years knows that the humor has gotten old, and consequently, Allen decided to finally pull the plug on his greatest achievement. Sometimes TV shows wear out their welcome, and in this case, everyone involved with "Home Improvement" just didn't know when to quit.

Along with "Fraiser," two other comedy series have almost the same critical acclaim. "Spin City" has won a number of well deserved awards, and "Friends" is TV's top rated sitcom.

In "Spin City," Michael J. Fox plays the deputy mayor of New York City whose job it is to answer to Brian Bostwick as his superior. The show has done extremely well in its three years on the air, and has outlasted shows such as "Cosby" and "Suddenly Susan," which were introduced around the same time (Although both "Cosby" and "Suddenly Susan" are still on the air, people simply are not watching).

After "Seinfeld" went off the air, "Friends" took over as king of sitcoms. Every week, millions of viewers tune in, to see the whining antics of Ross, Rachel, Joey, Chandler, Monica, and Phoebe who, despite being six of the most attractive people on the planet, can never seem to hold a steady significant other.

Though the show has been nominated for numerous awards, it has only won one. Last September, Lisa Kudrow finally won Best Supporting Actress in a Comedy Series after being nominated on two previous occasions. The success of the show has not come without strong criticism however. The fact that there are no prominent minorities at all in the show, mixed with the fact that they live in New York City, one of the diverse places in the world, creates a lot of controverny. It will be interesting to see what kind of controversy arises if the show ever actually wins the Emmy for Best Comedy Series.

Some comedy that does cater to a diverse audience are shows such as "The Wayans Brothers" and "The Jamie Foxx Show," both on the WB. These shows follow in the footsteps of the hit excellent series "In Living Color," which aired in the late 80's to mid 90's. It would be extremely nice to see some of these shows get more recognition than they have currently been receiving. They have been on for quite a while now, and if they were able to get the proper appreciation, they may be able to pick up an even bigger audience.

Animated comedy is flourishing as well. Series such as "The Simpsons," "Futurama" and "Family Guy" seem to be the wave of the future, and it seems like new additions to this group are being added every week.

There are a lot of new shows that have entered and left network's line-ups in the past few months. The latest additions are ABC's "It's Like, You Know " and "The Norm Show;" the latter stars Norm MacDonald. Both shows are filled with quick one-liners, but lack a quality plot line, which will be the cause of their deaths very soon.

If you're in the mood to laugh before you go to bed, there's plenty of things on TV to suit you, after your local news. The battle between Jay Leno and David Letterman has been going on for half a decade now, with Leno beating Dave into the ground. Up until earlier this week, the ruler of Late Late talk shows has been Conan O'Brien.

But recently a new face has entered the talk show business. Craig Kilborn took the helm as the host of "The Late Late Show," which were previously held by Tom Snyder. Kilborn enters the scene, fresh off of his success on ESPN's "Sportscenter" and more recently, Comedy Central's "The Daily Show." It will be interesting to see how Kilborn fairs against talk show's elite, and whether or not he will continue his success streak that began the day he entered the world of entertainment.

As you can clearly see, there's something funny on TV for everyone. If you're in the mood for a laugh, just turn on the tube.

But the more disturbing aspects of pornography lie in the entangling of sexuality and violence. It has been estimated that 80 percent of pornography displays a woman being dominated, restrained, or beaten. And, about half of this figure includes depictions of explicit rape scenes.

You may think these figures are exaggerated because you have seen plenty of movies without women being tortured or beaten, but even a man forcefully holding a woman's head while they are engaged in sexual activity is a form of violence.

Studies have shown that this explicit depiction of abuse toward women affects women psychologically, especially young women. They begin to equate violence with love, assuming that abuse — which is called male aggressiveness — is alright because it is the way a man expresses his love.

The sexual objectification of women in porn, no matter what anyone says, carries over into everyday life. Women feel pressured to live up to these unmistakably larger than life sex objects, and their boyfriends and husbands want them to perform sexually in a more objectifying way.

More seriously, it has been studied and argued that what pornography really is is the articulation of the "rape fantasy" for men. While most people shy away from this connection between rape and pornography, many supporters of the industry claim that viewing pornography provides a healthy outlet for people's sexual urges.

"There would be more rape. I hear the threat under the reasoning tone, were there not pornography. Be grateful. Be grateful. Oh, but what a depressing picture of the world believing this voice gives me," says Susan Griffin in Sadism and Catharsis: The Treatment Is the Disease. This "outlet" argument put forth by pro-porn people seems to most definitely link porn and rape.

The industry is also detrimental to the social and professional lives of women. Because of the large market for nude dancers, porno models and "actresses" (check out the ads in the Collegian), women forego making more beneficial job choices. Why would you waste your time in school, when you can make more money taking your clothes off?

Now I am sure that by this point every one of those who hold stock in this billion-dollar-a-year industry are saying she is one of those man-hating-prude types. But actually, this is not the case. I will not deny one of the most basic of human urges — sexuality. But, I argue that the porn industry preys upon this basic human drive that has been repressed by our society for hundreds of years. In other words, you are being taken advantage of purely for profit. Pornography keeps our sexuality closeted, as if it is– something that we should be ashamed of. In my opinion, this is just as bad as trying to deny the undeniable fact of human sexuality. Perhaps a more liberal society that is open about sexuality could help us to replace the need for this tacky trash.

I have viewed my share of "porn flicks," and I have perused a number of "dirty books," and after the initial shockingly arousing moment, it gets pretty boring. The blatant physicality (and close up shots) of porn make it so uninteresting and it prevents it from possessing any real eroticism (a necessary component for a truly great sexual experience.)

"The only thing making it degrading," Lacey says, "is other people saying it's dirty."

Devon, another stripper, used to go to UMass. "I went here and there," she explains when asked about school. Three years ago, "I was sleeping on my friend's floor in Butterfield, and she's like 'Come on, do amateur night'" she says, recalling her start as a stripper.

Her friend, already a stripper at the Castaway, recommended amateur night. It took a little coaxing, but the next thing she knew, she was "on her dorm room floor, doing splits, and like she's showing me moves."

She won the amateur contest, making $300 for 20 minutes of dancing. "I didn't have much time to think about it. I thought I had another hour and a half till I was up, and the next thing I knew they're like 'You're up. I'm like 'Oh my God!' Ms. Friendly-like, 'Don't worry. We're going to go out and buy you a bottle, get you drunk.' You know, I was dead sober."

Amateur night is one of the more popular features at the Castaway. A lot of college girls come out for amateur night, Jimmy says. When Devon stripped that night three years ago, there was a "huge crowd. This place was packed." Lacey agrees: "It's shoulder to shoulder." When asked why the night is so popular, she explains it this way: "Guys like amateurs. They love nude girls."

Rarely do the strippers run into a bad customer. Once in a while a customer gives the strippers quarters, "They do that to ball–bust, and then they're out the door."

"But most of the guys who come in here are really nice," Lacey adds. "Usually it's one guy and his friends are like 'Shut up!'"

"It's a tough business. They [the patrons] see you with your with your clothes off and they think you're a fantasy woman, and it's like 'I'm a woman.'"

Jimmy's been sticking with local strippers for years now, not often bringing famous strippers or porn stars to the Lounge. Once they had Marilyn Chambers. But paying so much money for a dancer, "to tell you the truth it's hurting the business. You have to pay so much, charge at the door."

And Jimmy couldn't get over former Penthouse Pet Dominique St. Croix, who danced at the lounge in 1986. "She was the most beautiful lady you ever wanted to see. She was a great dancer."

But the best girls, according to Jimmy, come from UMass. "Oh, yes. Absolutely," he says.

them extremely watchable.

Unlike most pornographic filmmakers, Russ Meyer mingles fantastic, titillating images with a sense of irony. Cartoon–like, outrageously buxom women aggressively pursue average men. Sexual episodes are intertwined with creative violence. In the background of an exuberant copulation scene (sometimes the pneumatic female leads almost become airborne) the camera winks at obvious phallic symbols — drills, gas pumps, cigarettes. When the camera switches to a character's perspective, he or she is usually looking at someone's crotch.

Meyer's big, bouncy hits include Beyond the Valley of the Dolls (1970), his well–known parody of Californian youth culture. An all–girl rock group (with lots of healthy, American cleavage) crosses the States. Wild times ensue: lesbian sex, liaisons with Nazi barmen and various porn stars, illegal drugs. Like many of Meyer's films, Beyond is loaded with black humor: its dark plot twists include a drug overdose and serious injury to the point where a character is paralyzed. Roger Ebert worked with Meyer on this trailer–trash film classic, collaborating on great lines like these: "In a party like this you get a CONTACT high!"

Another great cheesecake film of Meyers is Faster Pussycat! Kill! Kill! It indulges every fantasy scenario of female violence. It was billed with "a word of caution: handle with care and don't drop your guard. This rapacious new breed prowls alone and in packs. Operating at any level, at any time, anywhere and with anybody." The film begins in a go–go club and culminates in fights, death–via– karate chop, kidnapping, and orgies. Tura Santana, the female lead, was known as one of Meyer's "buxotics."

One of Meyer's X–rated films, Super Vixens, takes "six of the world's most BOUNTIFUL women" on an entertaining romp of — you guessed it — sex, violence, and big breasts. One of the funniest is the "Austrian mail–order bride," a vision of mammary loveliness in a tiny peasant blouse and a toothy grin. Her sex drive is out–of–control — she rapes the male lead in a bale of hay. Again, the dark humor includes a bathtub murder in which an electric appliance meets water... not pretty.

These films are more fun than a sack o' flour on the floor. Keep in mind that you can't get them at Blockbuster — their soft–porn content doesn't sit well with the bigwigs (that's why they have a limited selection of foreign films, whose content can be marginal by American standards). Video To Go has over a shelf devoted to Meyer, and their staff can recommend their faves. Groovy!

■ women

some show– tunes or something.

The pornography (or erotica as women in the know apparently call it) for heterosexual women is seemingly non– existent. We are taught to be ashamed of our interest in all things sexual. But I, being the Joan of Arc that I am, decided to see what was out there on the web for women. What I found was less than shocking: there's not a whole helluva a lot. And what there is — more creepy than sexy.

www.croticaforwomen.com — This is probably the only site that didn't make me feel too queasy. Every story and photograph had a warning system. Nice: safe for all women. No nudity or sexual slang (uh, not porn either, but nice.) Naughty: bare chests, stories with sexual slang. Naughtier: pictures of men and women exposing privates, and Very Naughty: men and women in sexual situations.

The only good or erotic things about the site are the fantasy stories written by women. They are sexy but not in a disturbing way. Some are just plain funny though. The summary of one is: "To celebrate Paul's birthday, Becky has thrown him a party but Paul is more interested in getting his present." Hee, hee. I don't think the present was a new set of golf clubs.

The photo gallery, unlike the stories, did make me feel kind of wrung. They were mostly pictures of oiled up men with perms holding their manhood. Not sexy.

November's Erotica (www.151.201.20.77/November/) — This is a site for heterosexual, bisexual, and gay women. There is one erotic story built around the song "The Kiss," by The Cure and many others for "Trent Reznor fetishists." I didn't get it but whatever gets your boat a–rowin,' I guess. There was also an X–Files story. Okay, this is going to sound very judgmental but I gathered the people writing these stories were the same people who spend their lives on the Internet and are into Sci–Fi. That isn't so sexy.

In this site's photo gallery, "November," showed herself in a variety of interracial sexual scenarios. There was a big red box on certain areas and it was kind of degrading to all those involved.

There are also some personal homepages especially written for women on www.geocities.com/Soho/studio/8841 contains erotica stories from a more sophisticated pen. The stories are more roses and wine than pink stilletos and hairspray. One story is called, "My Young Painter," and is about "a woman who meets a young man in her French class and is enchanted." The stories will make you blush, but not feel too uncomfortable.

In conclusion, I think I realized through this experiment that it's just the essence of porn that maybe doesn't appeal to me, and not the way it is necessarily presented. I, like a lot of women I know, think sexuality is highly intimate. I think the mind is the most powerful and sexy kind of "porn" there is. It's free, and you'll never have to see an oiled up permed guy holding himself... unless you want to.

Field players Sarah Newell, Erin Hillier, and Katie Mayer showed great cohesiveness, playing off of each other's strengths to baffle the Brown field and create a number of mismatches. Hillier fed fellow field player Crenshaw for UMass' 10th goal at the 3:40 mark.

Hillier's enthusiasm on defense may have gotten the best of her, though, as the New York native drew three fouls in the next two minutes and was ejected with 2:30 remaining in the half.

Brown won the third quarter swim–off and showed signs of a comeback, getting several good looks at the UMass goal before Goodhue again forced a turnover. As junior two– meter Marci Hupp smoked a blistering backhand past Long at the 5:23 mark of the third to push the UMass lead to nine goals, the crowd could smell blood in the water and roared its approval.

Co–captain Claudia Clement then got into the act, beating Long top–right to make it 13–2 and then dishing to Hupp, whose second score all but sewed up the contest.

Sophomores Karina Zarins and Vanessa Solis made the most of their fourth quarter playing time, combining for three goals and a steal in the final frame.

Last night's match concluded the Minutewomen's regular– season schedule. The post–season commences when UMass travels to Princeton, N.J. on the weekend of April 10 for the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championships.

"Princeton, Harvard, Maryland — the top teams in the East will all be at this tournament," McOsker said. "We've got to get ready for some really big games."

The No. 9 ranked Massachusetts women's water polo team blew Brown out of the water last night in a 16–4 final.

Jason Watts pleads guilty

SOMERSET, Ky. (AP) — Former Kentucky football player Jason Watts pleaded guilty yesterday to reckless homicide in the alcohol-related truck crash last year that killed a teammate and another young man. Although he won't be sentenced until April 16, Watts asked to begin serving his sentence immediately and was to report to the Pulaski County jail today.

Pulaski Commonwealth's Attorney Eddy Montgomery recommended a sentence of five years on each of the two counts to be served consecutively for a total of 10 years.

In a 10-minute appearance in Pulaski Circuit Court, Watts gave brief answers to Judge Daniel Venters, affirming that it was his free choice to plead guilty. Given an opportunity to make a public statement, Watts declined.

Watts had faced a July 19 trial on two counts of second-degree manslaughter and one of wanton endangerment in the wreck that killed teammate Arthur Steinmetz and Eastern Kentucky student Scott Brock.

Watts, a 21-year-old from Oviedo, Fla., was at the wheel early on the morning of Nov. 15 when his truck went out of control on U.S. 27 north of Somerset and overturned, killing Steinmetz, 19, and Brock, 21.

Steinmetz, who was from the northern Kentucky town of Edgewood, had transferred to Kentucky from Michigan State and was sitting out a year while waiting to become eligible.

Watts was severely injured in the crash and was dropped from the football team after authorities brought charges against him, saying his blood alcohol level was 1.5 times the legal limit. Watts left school after the crash but has since returned.

Asked why his son had pled guilty, Watts' father, Jim, said, "It's best for everyone to try to get on with their lives... This is a sad, sad day for everyone."

Asked why he thought Watts had made the unusual request to begin his jail sentence immediately, Montgomery said he thought the youth wanted to take responsibility for his actions.

Marquette hires Crean

MILWAUKEE (AP) — Hoping he can bring the Golden Eagles the kind of success Michigan State enjoyed, Marquette named Spartans assistant Tom Crean as its men's basketball coach.

Bill Cords, Marquette athletic director, noted that 33-year-old Crean comes from a program that just won a Big Ten title and reached the Final Four before losing to Duke on Saturday. Marquette hasn't reached the Final Four since its NCAA championship season in 1977 under Al McGuire.

"We've always believed if you've been to that level, you have vision," Cords said.

The Rev. Robert A. Wild, Marquette president, said Crean possesses everything the university was looking for, including "great recruiting ability, knowledge of the Midwest, successful coaching experience, a tremendous work ethic."

Marquette fired coach Mike Deane after the Golden Eagles' season ended with a first-round loss in the Conference USA tournament. Cords said Marquette's competitiveness "gradually eroded" during Deane's five-year tenure, even though he led the team to postseason tournaments the previous four years. His record at Marquette was 100-55.

Cords declined to say what qualities Crean brings that Deane didn't have.

"I'm not going to compare. I don't think that's fair to anyone," Cords said. "He's from a program that set a very high level."

Crean spent the last four seasons as an assistant with the Spartans and has been the associate head coach the last two. He said he brings enthusiasm and a willingness to work hard to his first head coaching job.

"I think you're going to see a selfless team," he said. "It's almost the same as unselfishness, but it takes it to another level, totally committed to your teammates, totally committed to the person next to you.

"We're going to create a bond here that when we walk into the Bradley Center, when we walk into opposing arenas, that we know the bond can't be broken."

Despite Sunday's road block, the road to success for the Minutewomen has been paved by its sensational pitching. On one end of the spectrum is senior Danielle Henderson. As the UMass strike-out queen and record-holder in virtually every pitching category, Henderson has already collected 170 strike-outs with a minuscule ERA of 0.54. On the other end is freshman Jen Hadley, who, in four full pitching appearances, has Sortino very encouraged about her potential.

And sophomore sensation Carrie Jeffries is right in the middle of things. But, from time to time, it's Jeffries who can look like the ace. In only her second collegiate season, she's already the reigning Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week. Hoping to give UMass an unbeatable one-two pitching punch of both herself and Henderson, Jeffries dedicated her off-season to conditioning.

"Over Christmas break I worked out a lot, lifted a lot," she said. "Compared to last year, I didn't even do that. I've been working a lot harder on getting stronger."

Henderson was also extremely proud of her teammate, whom she has watched develop into a dangerous pitcher.

"She's been doing really good. She's been hitting her spots well, and has been working hard," she said of Jeffries. "If you watch the games, you'll see that the [other] teams aren't hitting her hard. They're just hitting little dribblers [because] she's keeping them off balance. She's doing a real good job, and a lot of times people don't notice that."

WWF sees a lot of belts change at Wrestlemania

Michael P. Doyle

The World Wrestling Federation fell victim to the Rattlesnake's bite for the third time, with plenty of venom still left to be relinquished.

"Stone Cold" Steve Austin, the Texas Rattlesnake, reclaimed his seat at the head of the WWF table by defeating "The Rock" at Wrestlemania XV to become the WWF World Champion for the third time in his legendary career, proving he is still the "baddest s.o.b. on the planet."

On Sunday, March 29, Wrestlemania XV offered anything but brotherly love in the city of Philadelphia's sold out First Union Center, this year's host of the largest pay-per-view event in sports entertainment.

Austin landed two "Stone Cold Stunners" on the Corporate Champion before getting a three count en route to his impressive victory over the young and talented Rocky Maivia.

The victory marked an end to WWF owner Vince McMahon's six month "reign of terror" on Austin — an effort to prevent Austin from retaining the WWF Championship for the third time.

"Stone Cold" stood as sweat drenched on the turnbuckle as "Stevieweisers" poured down his throat in celebration as Philadelphia fans cheered and middle-fingers unholstered.

The championship match granted Austin no distraction from a scheduled guest referee. An earlier match between the "Big Show" Paul Wight and "Mankind" Mick Foley was supposed to decide guest referee duties. The match ended in disqualification, giving Foley the victory, but injuries sustained from a "back body drop" from the 450-pound Wight made Foley unable to return.

Wrestlemania also had a dark side. The "Lord of Darkness," the Undertaker, continued his Corporate-takeover efforts when he took on Corporate member the "Big Boss Man" in his third "Hell in a Cell" match. The match ended with Boss Man hanging by a noose high above the arena while the Undertaker rolled his evil eyes to the back of his head. No one is safe from the Ministry!

Four other championship belts were also on the line. Bob Holly reclaimed his "Hardcore Championship" from "Badd Ass" Billy Gunn to dethrone the Degeneration X member when he pinned Al Snow in a "Triple-Threat Match."

Jeff Jarrett and Owen Hart (they're still champions?) easily defeated Corporation member Test and teammate D'Lo Brown without the "exposure" of the sexy Deborah McMichael to retain their Tag Team champion belts. Test and Brown became partners after winning the elimination "Battle Royal" earlier in the evening.

"Oh, you didn't know?" The Intercontinental Champion and DX member "Road Dogg" Jesse James survived a "Four Corners" match between Goldust, "The Big Valbolski" Val Venis, and Corporate member Ken Shamnrock to remain I.C. Champ. Another DX member, X-Pac, failed to overcome European Champ and Greenwich, Conn. tough- man Shane McMahon in a controversial match. The bosses' son, joined by fellow Corporation member, the "lovely" Chyna, got help from former DX member Triple H, who gave Wrestlemania XV an unexpected twist by "turning Corporate" and turning on Degeneration X.

The night also featured commentator Jim Ross, who returned to the main event after months of being sidelined by Bell's Palsy.

Kane unmasked the "Phillie Chicken" to reveal baseball great Pete Rose (who didn't have money on the event), who was welcomed by a "tombstone" from the "Big Red Machine" in front of his former city.

It wasn't Rocky IV, but the "Brawl For All" boxing match between 330-pound IBA Superheavyweight Champion Butterbean and 230-pound WWF superstar Bart "The Hammer" Gunn definitely earned stars — too bad Gunn received them all. Butterbean embarrassed Gunn with a first round knockout, humbling Gunn, the 1998 WWF "Brawl For All" champion.

Jordan is still unsure about his future

CHICAGO (AP) — We can only be sure about what he WON'T do. Play baseball. Save the planet. Drive the carpool much longer. But what will Michael Jordan DO?

No matter what you hear, no one knows at the moment — not even the man himself. The reason Jordan refused to shut the door on a return to the NBA is because no one is happier hearing his name echoing down every hallway. So you know how much he must be loving it now.

Heading into the weekend, the scuttlebutt was that Jordan is interested only in owning the league's Charlotte franchise. On Tuesday night, it became that he might want to play for the team, too. The possibilities grow more intriguing by the day. At the breathless pace that Fox Sports News is pushing this story, mascot Hugo The Hornet's job won't be safe by the end of the week, either.

"I'd be very surprised if he came back and played," good buddy Charles Barkley told Fox when cornered by the network late Tuesday night.

"That's a new one," former running-mate Scottie Pippen weighed in a few minutes later. "I don't see him coming in as a player."

Of course, the two Houston Rockets have their reasons for wanting Jordan as far away from a basketball court as possible. His absence is Barkley's best chance to acquire at least one championship ring. It is Pippen's only chance to get his hands on any more.

But not all their reasons are selfish ones. Barkley, like Magic Johnson, another Jordan intimate, wants to see his friend become the first black owner of a major sports franchise. Both of them, as well as Pippen, share the same concern for Jordan's legacy that Jordan expressed at a retirement news conference barely 10 weeks ago.

"I think he'd do a disservice to himself," Barkley said. "I think all athletes who come back do a disservice to themselves."

Pippen, never an original thinker, concurred.

"He had a great career. He's going to leave it at that."

But will he?

The guess here is probably not.

People who have seen Jordan in recent days peg him at a good 20 pounds heavier than his last listed playing weight of 216.

He hardly needs the extra weight to leverage his bid to buy a controlling interest in the team since commissioner David Stern, along with just about everybody else in his home state of North Carolina, would like nothing more than to see Jordan ease current owner George Shinn on down the road. And they might even show their gratitude by building him that new stadium that Shinn has begged shamelessly for during the past few months.

But Jordan is likely to want his portion of ownership without putting much of his own money out, and for considerably less than half the $250 million that Shinn is said to be asking. That's where the playing part of the equation apparently comes in.

Current NBA rules prohibit a player from owning a team and vice versa. But if Jordan expressed a willingness to climb back into a uniform, who knows what concessions the league might be willing to throw at his feet?

And if the spirit of cooperation really taken hold, who's to say the rest of a widely-circulating wish list couldn't come true: Jordan's last coach, Phil Jackson, back coaching for at least one season; his college coach, Dean Smith, as the Hornets' president; his agent, David Falk, negotiating player contracts.

are shaping up nicely for the Dallas Stars, who are running away with the conference. The 46-15-12 Stars have already clinched their Division and are looking to lock up the President's Trophy in the upcoming nights, starting with a game tonight against the Lightning.

Offensively, Mike Modano has been the key, as he has collected 74 points after getting off to a slow start this season. Defensively, Darryl Sydor and Ed Belfour will continue to pace the Stars. Belfour has reached the 30-win plateau yet again in his illustrious career. The team that is likely to win the whole thing, is the No. 2 team in the west, the Colorado Avalanche. The 'Lanche have lost Valeri Kamensky for the season, and the funny thing is that this doesn't even affect their offense one bit. They still have Petr Forsberg and Joe Sakic, who have combined this season for 57 goals and 159 points to pace the offense.

Claude Lemieux has been the Avalanche's top threat on the power play, as he is among the league leaders in power play goals. Theo Fleury was injured for a while for the 'Lanche, but since his return in the past eight games he has scored eight goals and seven assists for 15 points. The 'Lanche also have the benefit of two of the league's top rookies. Chris Drury, from Boston University, has been a godsend as he has scored 38 points to lead all rookies, and Milan Hejduk has been a glorious surprise for the Avalanche, who has tallied 34 points including 11 goals. In net Patrick Roy has been solid enough to win when his stacked offense puts up the numbers. Roy is only allowing 2.31 goals a game in 50 outings. Roy also has three Stanley Cup rings to his credit.

The Detroit Red Wings will win their division and hold on to the three spot in the conference but expect them to be ousted in the second round when they face the 'Lanche in what promises to be a physical series. In fact, that series is the only thing that might keep the 'Lanche from winning the cup. The recent acquisitions of Wendel Clark and Chris Chelios will strengthen the Wings, but that will not win them the cup.

The Phoenix Coyotes made a fabulous acquisition when they acquired Robert Reichel from the fire sale in New York. Reichel proved that he was a quality acquisition when he scored two goals and an assist in a 7-4 win over the Oilers. The series between the Coyotes and Mighty Ducks will be a great one.

The Ducks continue to improve as their big guns continue to produce, but with the increase in defense around the league, the advantage that goes along with the power play is huge. For the Ducks they have the league's top three power play scorers with Teemu Selanne, Paul Kariya and Fredrik Olausson who have scored 44, 37 and 36 points respectively on the man advantage.

The St. Louis Blues have to make an impact soon if they want to avoid the Red Wings in the first round because they will need to catch Anaheim, who is up four points on them. But the Blues aren't as strong as they were last year. Pierre Turgeon is solid as usual, but the team's leader has been third-year man Pavol Demitra, who has collected 75 points thus far this season, of which 34 are goals.

The Sharks are in seventh place in the conference, and currently hold that spot by three points over the Calgary Flames and four points over the Edmonton Oilers.

These bottom three teams, although many of them have players who are impact players, none of them really have a chance to make any real noise in the playoffs.

The Sharks didn't make any significant moves before the deadline, while the Oilers picked up goaltender Tommy Salo from the Islanders. They might as well play with an empty net. In their loss to the Coyotes Tuesday night, Salo let in three goals on the first three shots and was pulled for Bob Essensa.

As the season winds down look for the races to heat up, with only two to three weeks remaining but remember now that your Stanley Cup champions for 1998-99 will be the Avalanche barring a Duke-esque choke job.

Minutewomen wounded in an epic lacrosse match

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — One... last... chance... The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (3-5) traded tragic death scenes with yesterday's opponent, Brown (3-3, 1-0 Ivy League), before finishing off the drama by collapsing in anguish one last time — allowing a game-winning goal with 0:34 left in overtime to break an 11-11 tie.

Bear attack Lauren Klein picked up the hosts' 12th and final point with a rocket from 11 feet away that beat UMass goaltender Tara Durkin. The score completed a comeback that started after the Minutewomen took the lead by one, 11- 10, with 1:17 to go in the first three-minute overtime session on a Noelle Gorski shot.

At the end of regulation, Brown donned their own cloak of Shakespearean-style demise, watching helplessly as Massachusetts co-captain Melissa Anderson spearheaded a valiant assault that overturned a 9-7 deficit. The senior scored UMass' last three goals of the second period, including two unanswered, to send the game into overtime deadlocked at nine.

"[Anderson] did well today," Brown Coach Theresa Ingram said. "She definitely did."

Said UMass Coach Francesca McClellan: "Certainly one of the good things was that we didn't throw the towel in. Our kids kept fighting back."

Overall, though, it was the Minutewomen who drank more of the proverbial poison, turning the ball over at key intervals when the game was on the line during the overtime periods. Massachusetts played the tragic heroes perfectly, even adding Stephanie Pavlick, a valuable offensive threat, to an increasing list of injured UMass players that includes defenders Colleen Wales and Shalee Merkle.

The Bears, who lost the lead four separate times themselves over the course of the back-and-forth game, finally bronzed Klein as their team savior, scoring two goals — including the game-winner. Junior attacks Emily Boynton and Cristi Gigon also caused problems for the Minutewomen, tallying three and one goals, respectively.

Aside from Anderson's late-game offensive flurry, McClellan could only count on inconsistency from those players who are normally her stars.

UMass senior co-captain Laura Kovartz, although breaking a four-game scoreless streak with 19 seconds gone in the first overtime session, seemed to play very erratically and could not cause a serious threat to the Brown defense.

"I think that it helped that maybe No. 9, Laura Korutz, was getting a little bit frustrated during the game today and I think it was apparent to some of our players on the team that that was the case," Ingram said.

Gorski helped the Massachusetts cause with two goals and an assist, and defender Melissa Miele picked up her third score of the season at the 26:56 mark in the opening period.

Miele's point tied the game at 1-1 after Boynton christened the scoreboard with a low shot past UMass starting net-minder Jen Nardi after only 1:12 had ticked off the clock in the game.

The Minutewomen then took the lead as Gorski lobbed a quick pass to sophomore Fay Naber, who came from behind the opposing goal to redirect the ball past Bear goalie Shea Obremski.

The game was tied once again just under two and a half minutes later when Boynton scored her second goal, causing McClellan to replace Nardi with Durkin. Durkin went on to record a career-high in saves, with 17.

The see-saw battle continued throughout the duration of the matchup, with neither team taking larger than a two-goal advantage. When the dust cleared, UMass headed home with no more than they had come with.

"Every game counts," McClellan said. "We play 14 games, and every game counts. We don't practice five or six weeks in the preseason to throw games away."

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

Laura Korutz had a goal yesterday, but it wasn't enough, as the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team fell to Brown 12-11 in overtime.

Mental toughness decides lax winner

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — The respective coaches of the Massachusetts and Brown women's lacrosse teams collectively felt yesterday's thrilling 12-11 Bear overtime win which was influenced by one overriding factor.

"Mental toughness decided this game," Massachusetts Coach Francesca McClellan said. "We have individuals playing with a lack of confidence right now, and they don't seem to be turning it around in a timely fashion."

"It is important to approach every game in the right frame of mind, but in the close ones like this it really shows how important that aspect of the game becomes," Brown coach Theresa Ingram said.

The victory was especially pleasing for Ingram because the Bears dropped four one-goal games last year, including an 8-7 defeat at the hands of UMass in Amherst.

"It's incredibly important for these kids to get a win like this," Ingram said. "To be on the other end of a close game for a change is a huge morale booster."

On the other side of the fence, McClellan was left virtually dumbfounded by her team's lack of consistency and ability to gut out a tight contest.

"I can't explain why they panicked," McClellan said. "We had control of this game. It is getting to the point where they are as much a mystery to me as anybody."

McClellan was referring to periods when the UMass offense was out of sync, particularly during a 19:50 scoreless drought for the Minutewomen.

Fay Naber knotted the game at six apiece with 1:01 to play in the first half, but the Minutewomen did not light up the scoreboard again until Melissa Anderson broke through against Brown keeper Niki Caggiano with 11:11 remaining in the game.

Anderson proceeded to go on a one-woman attack thereafter, as she posted her second hat-trick of the season to lead a fierce Minutewoman comeback.

The senior midfielder netted all three of those goals within a 10-minute span which left the game tied at nine, and Anderson's season point total at a team-high 12.

"Melissa took care of business at a point where we needed someone to step up and take care of business," McClellan said.

"On the whole, the team was competitive for a greater number of minutes than they were against Boston University and Syracuse, but we need to play for 60 minutes to win."

The trio of UMass losses to BU, Syracuse and the Bears has McClellan understandably concerned, because they were all ranked opponents, and a win yesterday could have removed a large weight from the shoulders of the Minutewomen.

"This is a game that could have gotten the team over the hump of not winning a pressure game," McClellan said. "At least today was a real fight, which was a statement. Unfortunately we didn't win the fight."

Bulldogs select Jim Harrick as new head coach

ATHENS, Ga. (AP) — Jim Harrick was hired yesterday as basketball coach at Georgia after guiding UCLA to a national championship in 1995 and spending the past two seasons at Rhode Island.

A source close to the situation, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed Harrick as the choice. He will succeed Ron Jirsa, who was fired March 11 after failing to lead Georgia to the NCAA tournament during his two years.

Harrick was chosen over Appalachian State's Buzz Peterson, who was endorsed by Dean Smith and Michael Jordan, his former coach and teammate, respectively, at North Carolina. The other finalist, Delaware's Mike Brey, removed himself from consideration.

Georgia president Michael Adams apparently was the driving force behind the hiring of Harrick, who was at Pepperdine when Adams was the school's vice president of development.

Harrick, 60, has a career record of 404-190 in 19 years as a head coach at Pepperdine, UCLA and Rhode Island. He accepted the Georgia job after agreeing not to bring his son, Jim Jr., as an assistant coach because of the state's anti-nepotism law.

After winning the national title at UCLA, Harrick was fired on Nov. 6, 1996, for his involvement with a recruiting dinner involving more players than allowed by NCAA rules. Harrick paid the dinner tab and allegedly lied about how many people were at the dinner.

Harrick apologized and admitted to a lapse in judgment but said he did not deserve to be fired. He accused UCLA athletic director Peter Dalis of being "out to get me."

After sitting out the 1996-97 season, Harrick returned to coaching at Rhode Island, leading the Rams to two straight appearances in the NCAA tournament. They reached the regional final in 1998 and lost to North Carolina-Charlotte in the first round this year.

Harrick was the Pepperdine coach for nine seasons, a tenure that began in 1979 and included four NCAA tournament appearances and the only losing season of his college career in 1986-87.

Moving to UCLA, his teams never won fewer than 21 games in eight years, highlighted by a 31-2 mark during the national title season.

Jirsa was hired for his first head coaching job when Tubby Smith left for Kentucky in 1997.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — The best option is not likely to present itself right away today, but upon some investigation, your part will be pointed out to you.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You'll enjoy an unexpected reward before the day is out, thanks to something you did some time ago which you forgot about.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — It's a good day to maintain a calm, rational, and realistic approach to even the most unusual of situations. Others around you may well panic.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Someone you know well may actually be fighting to prevent you from doing what you want to do, but he or she may have a good reason for it.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may discover that a current project is not going exactly as planned today, and you can do much to pick up the pace and improve chances for success.

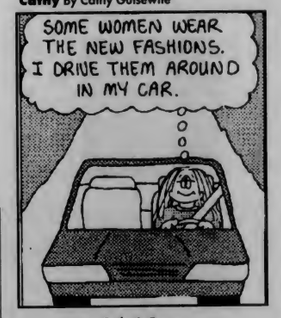
VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — What are you going to do about the constant reminder in your life about how much you made a certain key mistake a while ago? It is time to move on.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be surprised to learn that your activities are the focus of a great deal of attention today. What makes you so interesting right now?

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You're going to have to consider all the risks before taking action that might be considered "extreme" by some of your critics.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You're surely going to want to explore both sides of an unpopular issue today before making a decision one way or the other.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Say "no" if you must, but realize that by turning down certain offers, you're going to be passing up the kind of thing you've been looking forward to for quite some time.



AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You're getting a great deal of support and praise at this time, but you may still feel as though you're not getting things quite right.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may uncover some answers today that keep you from moving forward at your preferred pace. Things may be more dangerous than expected.

NHL squads are battling for final playoff berths

The National Hockey League's regular season is winding down and the really exciting playoff hunt is beginning, as teams make their final runs for playoff positioning or, in some cases, just try to make a run at a playoff birth.

• Let's start in the Eastern Conference where the shock of the season for non-hockey followers has to be that the Ottawa Senators are in first place in the conference. But with their main gun Alexei Yashin having the season he has had, that's a good reason why the Senators are having a great year. Yashin has collected 39 goals and 40 assists for 79 points in 70 games.

Another major reason for the Senator's success has to lie with the play of veteran goalie Ron Tugnutt, who has a 1.68 GAA (first in the NHL) in 36 games played, to go along with a save percentage of 0.932 (second in the league).

The Senators also made a case for representing the conference as its No. 1 team when they recently knocked off the NHL's best team record-wise, the Dallas Stars, 3-2.

Chasing the Senators are the New Jersey Devils, the leaders of the Atlantic Division. The Devils are once again riding the play of Vezina Trophy Candidate Martin Brodeur. Brodeur again leads the league in number of wins with 32, but hasn't had the same quality numbers in the GAA and save percentage departments.

Another reason the Devils are playing as well as they are is the play of the line of Jason Arnott, Petr Sykora and Patrik Elias. In the last 15 games, the unit has produced 24 goals and 33 assists and has led the Devils to an 8-3-4 record during that span. But with the Senators as hot as they have been, they should be able to hold off the Devils and keep the No. 1 spot in the conference.

The Carolina Hurricanes are No. 3 in the conference, only because they are the leaders of the Southeast Division. The 'Canes currently have 78 points, which means that if they weren't in that terrible division they would be the seventh ranked team in the conference and wouldn't even be getting a home playoff series. Expect them to be ousted early come playoff time.

Despite the fact that Keith Primeau is having the year of his life, that simply will not be enough for the 'Canes to make noise in the playoffs.

The Pittsburgh Penguins and the Toronto Maple Leafs are currently No. 4 and 5, and expect them to stay there given the recent play of the Philadelphia Flyers. The Flyers, who are in sixth place in the conference, have enormous amounts of talent, including players like Eric Lindros, Mark Recchi, John LeClair and Eric Desjardins. However, those guys have been playing really poorly. The good news for the Flyers is that Recchi skated for the first time in eight days on Tuesday and is expected to play either tonight or Saturday's game for the Flyers, which should provide them offense with a spark.

The Flyers also received good news defensively when they signed Desjardins to a four-year deal worth close to $16 million.

Seventh place in the East is currently held by the Sabres. Although many have said that the new acquisitions like Stu Barnes aren't the reasons for the team's rejuvenated success; Barnes has only tallied three assists since being acquired. Still, the team has turned it around, going 4-1-2 since his arrival. Things will get even better for the Sabres when Joe Juneau suits up tonight after missing several games with the flu.

The Bruins keep plugging along in the eighth spot, but suffered a huge loss to a bad Los Angeles Kings team, 2-1 in overtime on Tuesday night. Mind you, the Kings scored two soft goals on "the Bum" Lord Byron.

Bruins coach Pat Burns said that with the loss the Bruins have let a lot of teams back into the playoff picture. The team's Burns were referring to include the New York Rangers and the Florida Panthers, who both trail the Bruins by five points for the last playoff spot.

The Bruins are glad to see that Anson Carter and Joe Thornton have provided the B's with some depth on their second line for the stretch run.

The Rangers have Wayne Gretzky back. Gretzky broke Gordie Howe's all-time goals record on Monday night when he scored his 1,072 goal against the Isles. Brian Leetch said that it's good to have Gretzky back and that this newest of milestones probably won't be broken.

For the Panthers the burden of making the playoffs looms heavily on the shoulders of Pavel Bure. But now that Bure is out for the season with a torn ligament in his knee, you can pretty much count out the offenseless Panthers as well.

UM baseball shuts out Hartford, 13–0

Sophomore Skirkanich duels a three–hit, 10 strikeout gem

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

If there has been one constant for the Massachusetts baseball team as of late, it would certainly be the offense. Pitching has proved to be tedious and often unpredictable with limited success.

But yesterday the two collided to put the brand on a scattered Hartford team, 13–0.

Chris Morgan

Sophomore Nick Skirkanich hurled nine scoreless innings to pick up the win. The right-hander allowed just two hits and mowed down a career-high 10 Hawk batters.

"Everything came together today," said Skirkanich. "I was just trying to throw strikes and give my team a chance to win. It was definitely the best outing [of my career]."

Freshman Chris Morgan called the game behind the plate and also went 2-for-3 with two walks and attributed the solid pitching performance as the key to the victory.

"It was all Nick Skirkanich today," Morgan said. "He threw really well today. I just tried to keep the ball in front of me."

The Minutemen put the hurt on early, spanking Hartford with five runs in the bottom of the first. After leadoff batter Shaun Skeffington got caught in a run-down between third and home, Aaron Braunstein slapped a single to right center, which scored Bryan Mazzaferro, who had reached on a single. Designated hitter Brian Samela then streaked a double down the right field line to knock in Scott Anderson and Braunstein. Samela had two doubles, mirroring his performance against Connecticut. Mike Kulak then reached on an error in the infield. Morgan singled to left center to knock in Kulak to close out the early scoring.

"I just tried to get a good pitch up there," said Morgan of his performance.

Scoring stood at a standstill for three innings until the Minutemen tacked on three more runs in the fifth inning. Braunstein blasted his third home run of the season to open the gates. Mike Kulak then reached on a single and stole second. The next batter, Morgan, walked. Freshman Aaron Senez took advantage of the situation, rapping a long single to knock in Kulak and Morgan.

The Hawks strapped themselves in with six errors on the day and UMass took full advantage. Massachusetts tagged on two more runs in the sixth to bring the lead to double digits at 10–0. Kulak, who went 3-for-5 on the day and scored three runs, drove in two of his three RBIs off a double.

Nate Lang, who had two hits on the day, connected for his first home run of the year to open up the bottom of the seventh. Skeffington and Mazzaferro, who went 3-for-4 with a double, both reached first with consecutive singles. Braunstein and Kulak came through in the clutch, knocking in two runs between the two of them to round out the game's scoring.

"It was real important [for a good outing after Monday's 20-14 loss to UConn]," UMass coach Mike Stone said.

Hartford drops to 3–8 on the year. The Hawks drained four pitchers. Starting left-hander Mike Pesce pitched 5.1 innings, letting up nine runs to earn the loss.

Skirkanich improves his record to 1–1. The Minutemen, who had 16 players get a chop at the plate, battered the Hawk rotation for 19 hits. The defense was much improved from Monday's game at UConn, only committing two errors.

The key is for everyone to come together," Morgan said. "We just need to come out and play everyday."

The next home game is not until April 7 against Central Connecticut, who UMass downed 17–0 during spring break in Florida.

This weekend serves up the first Atlantic 10 action of the year as the Minutemen head to Duquesne for a three-game series.

Minutemen put it all together in 13–0 victory

No matter where the schedule has dictated that the Massachusetts baseball team play over the last three weeks, there has been one constant among the way — the UMass bats have come along for the ride.

Whether it be in Florida, Connecticut or home at Earl Lorden Field, the Minutemen have been putting up impressive offensive numbers all season long. In fact, UMass (9–8) has scored at least five runs in 15 of 19 games this season.

But those who live by the sword often die by it, and that couldn't be more true for the Minutemen. In those four games in which they haven't scored five runs UMass has managed to muster a total of only five runs — all four of which have been losses.

"You can't always count on your offense to be there," UMass baseball coach Mike Stone said. "We've been fortunate because we work real hard on it, using wooden bats in practice to help us out. In the game of baseball you can't count on it [offense] because you never know what can happen.

"Look at the major leagues. Sometime you just can't hit the ball," added Stone. "Or look at yesterday's game, where we scored eight runs in the first inning and still ended up losing."

Yesterday at Lorden Field the UMass bats showed up as usual, but a couple of other key pieces to the puzzle were present as well. Thanks to a complete game three-hitter from sophomore Nick Skirkanich and solid defense in the field, the Minutemen rolled over the University of Hartford, 13–0.

Mike Kulak
COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Oh most days it would be very easy to focus on the offensive attack put forth by the Maroon and White. This day, however, belonged to Skirkanich, who baffled the Hawks all afternoon en route to his first victory of the season.

"I was just trying to throw strikes and have the team a chance to win," Skirkanich said. "I feel like I'm starting to get into a groove even though it's still early."

Hartford was having problems all day trying to figure out the right-hander. The Cheshire, Conn. native fanned 10 along the way and helped boost the confidence of his fellow staff members after a shaky outing yesterday. UMass pitchers gave up 20 runs in a loss to Connecticut on Tuesday.

"There was a huge contrast between yesterday and today. I think that yesterday was the worst exhibition of pitching and defense that I've seen by a UMass team since I've been here," Stone said. "We had to bounce back after yesterday. With the leadership that he [Skirkanich] had on the mound today, that really set the tone."

Said Skirkanich: "It was real important [to have a good outing on the heels of the UConn game]. Our A-10 schedule is starting this weekend, and we've got to start playing well."

While defensively the Minutemen made only two harmless errors, offensively, the same old UMass team put in an appearance at Lorden Field. The hosts pounded out 19 hits against four different Hartford pitchers and easily rolled to their ninth win of the year.

Senior third baseman Bryan Mazzaferro led the Minutemen with a 5-for-4 afternoon, while freshman outfielder Mike Kulak also added three hits, three RBIs and two runs scored. Four other players also had multiple hit games for the Minutemen. Nate Lang and Aaron Braunstein each homered in the game, while Chris Morgan and Shaun Skeffington each chipped in two hits apiece.

For now, however, the high octane UMass offense will get a rest today before taking its traveling road show to Pittsburgh this weekend for a three-game set with Duquesne. The Minutemen are hoping that their sticks don't get left behind in Amherst just when their quest towards the Atlantic 10 tournament gets underway.

UMass defeats Brown 16–4

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

A 1999 schedule laden with away contests has forced the Massachusetts women's water polo team to defeat foe after foe in hostile foreign waters. So, when the Bears of Brown University invaded Amherst last night, the No. 9 Minutewomen saw a chance to bask in the glory of a home field victory.

The Maroon and White utilized a balanced attack of aggressive scoring and tenacious defense in a 16–4 rout of the Bears. Those in attendance were treated to perhaps the strongest showing of the season from Coach Dan McOsker's troops, who ran their record to 19–4 on the season.

"It's always different playing at home," said McOsker, last year's Eastern Coach of the Year. "The girls have all of their friends here, so they get pretty fired up."

The team also got a lift from the fact that it was junior Katie Grogan's birthday. As the team serenaded their co- captain through warm-ups, All-American Grogan was preparing to give UMass a few gifts of her own.

The Minutewomen jumped out to an early 3–0 lead courtesy of two dynamic goals from Grogan and a score from freshman field player Jacqui Goodhue. Grogan then shrugged off intense defensive pressure from a Brown double-team and threaded an amazing pass to freshman Anne Detloff, whose best pals Bears goalkeeper Jenny Long with 2:45 left in the opening frame made it 4–1 in favor of the home team.

Amazingly, Grogan's performance was delivered in lieu of a nagging knee injury.

"I injured myself in practice yesterday," said Grogan, who leads the Minutewomen in scoring thus far in '99. "I didn't want to push it too much out there."

Grogan played only one quarter, yet still managed to lead UMass with three goals.

The offensive fireworks set off by UMass early were cleanly the result of the team's defensive precision, as field players Laurie Edwards and Lindsay Crenshaw put the clamps on Brown's ball handling and forced numerous turnovers. Goodhue also proved to be quite a defensive force for the Minutewomen, thwarting several Brown transitions with her athleticism and knack for positioning.

"Our defense has improved all season" Grogan said. "I think every team hopes to get better with each game, and that's the story with us."

The early lead gave McOsker the luxury of inserting a number of fresh competitors, each of whom made an immediate impact on the contest. Freshman field player Megan Perry didn't miss a beat on offense, rapidly netting two goals to push the UMass lead to 9–1. The first goal was set up by a fantastic steal and fast-break sequence from Detloff, who earned an assist on the play.

Stand-in goalkeeper Alexa Olsen seemed unfazed by the Brown counter-attack, using her 5-foot-9 frame to deny four Brown shots before giving way to fellow first-year player Chrissy Richardson in the second quarter. Olsen punctuated her performance by heaving a length-of-the-pool shot that got by Long for UMass' sixth goal at the first quarter buzzer.

"We don't usually play in a shallow-end pool, so we put Alexa in to give us a height advantage," McOsker said. "Obviously it worked, as she scored a goal. That's not something you see too often."

Softball to open at home

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

There really is no place like home... especially when you haven't seen it for the past 22 games.

After a rigorous non-conference schedule, which has included tournaments in Arizona, Georgia, Florida and New Jersey, the Massachusetts softball team will finally open at home on the friendly confines of Totman Field today, when they play host to a 3:00 p.m. doubleheader against Vermont.

"There's nothing more thrilling each year than your home- opener," 19-year UMass coaching veteran Elaine Sortino said. "Your friends are there, you're back on your home field. It's very exciting. It's kind of like starting over again. It's like you almost haven't played before. It's that exciting."

Once the chaotic traveling finally ceased for the Minutewomen, they managed to use the past few days of practice to prepare today's home-opener.

But Sortino has been warning her squad that its homecoming may not be a happy occasion, as she anticipates a battle against the Catamounts (8–6), who will be eager take their only shot of the season at No. 21 UMass (15–7).

There now rests an even larger target on the backs of each Minutewomen. After their most successful early-season campaign in recent years, as well as two consecutive trips to the College World Series, UMass has become the most recognized team in the region — and that includes the UMass program one that all others would love to beat.

"People are going to play very well against us. When you're the kind of team we are, teams play up to your level," Sortino said. "I don't know how many opponents we had last year that would come up here, and I'd hear their coach say 'that was the best game we've played all year.' Everybody wants to knock us off, so we always have to be on our toes."

There's no question that Sortino recognizes her 1999 team as one of the best she has ever coached. There's also no question that her team is better than Vermont, at least as far as rankings are concerned. But what does trouble her ever so slightly is what the rankings don't reveal, i.e. momentum.

Last Saturday the Minutewomen topped Connecticut and Princeton by a combined margin of 6–0, but on Sunday they struggled against regional rival Hofstra, falling 7–4.

"I feel like our play this past weekend was just OK," said Sortino, who reminds her players that the solid 15–7 start will not give them an edge in today's contest. "I don't feel like we're coming off any gigantic momentum springboard, or anything like that."

Another club for Amherst? You bet your sweet bippy!

By Bradford Pinkham
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — In an effort to capitalize on Amherst's recent legal battles with Pruddy's Bar and Grill, University of Massachusetts journalists Mike Messaros and Seth Koenig have dropped out of school to open a dance club in the center of town.

"The Mustard Stain", a hangout which is the product of almost a week of planning, is set to open its doors tomorrow on 113 Pleasant Street.

When asked about the nature of the establishment, co- founder Messaros said: "We're opening this club for one reason; to get chicks. Seth and I have been frequenting all the clubs in Northampton for weeks, and it's obvious to us that these places don't cut it — notice I don't have any chicks."

The Stain will resemble a huge pair of boxer briefs with a hole in the front for the door. As a creative security system, a large phallus will pop out of the door to knock over unwanted solicitors.

Devastatingly handsome, but they wet the bed, girls.

"I thought of the penis," claimed Koenig proudly. "I figured that it would make for good T-shirt slogans as well as keeping undesirables out. 'I was good enough not to catch a dick in the mouth at The Mustard Stain!' and ones outside that say 'I got dicked at The Mustard Stain,' are our ideas so far."

Koenig claims that there will be an elaborate setup of cameras viewing the entrance, and a shady, dark-haired student-radio head-man named "Mr. Perrault" will be deciding from a secret room somewhere in Boise who can get in.

The name "The Mustard Stain" comes from a poignant experience that the two shared when they were in grade school.

"It's quite a special name because it was a really traumatic moment," Messaros said. "Seth and I were in Barbados trying to pick up chicks — because the clubs in Northampton just weren't doing the trick — and just as I was about ready to make my move on some gorgeous vixen, I noticed a huge stain on Seth's pant leg. I think he noticed the fear in my eyes because he immediately started screaming, 'It's mustard! It's mustard!' From that day on, we've never ordered anything with that sauce on it just in case."

Said Koenig: "It was mustard. I swear to God.

Tom Hanks likes watermelons, corn; watches hand as it goes ka-boooom

By Birdy
Brought to you by the letter "H"

In a move that shocked Hollywood, Tom Hanks, America's favorite leading man, announced yesterday that he had signed a contract to reprise his role as an Army Officer in a prequel to Saving Private Ryan. The prequel to the popular World War II drama will be based on "The Babysitters' Club" book series by Ann M. Martin.

"I've always been inspired by those babysitters," said Hanks in a prepared statement yesterday. "They helped me through some tough times."

In another surprise announcement, Hanks revealed that most of the roles in the film will be played by barnyard animals. The vicious Sargent, played by Tom Sizemore in the original film, will be portrayed by a dwarf pony. The role of Mary–Ann, the quiet, sensitive babysitter, will be filled by a goat. The glamourous part of Stacey, the popular girl, will be played by a mouse stapled to a rooster. Matt Damon will return as Private Ryan.

When asked about the unusual cast, Hanks replied curtly "Curtly." He went on to add "What's wrong with Matt Damon? He can ride a bike and wear a dress and talk about boys on the phone just as well as that rooster with the mouse stapled to it." The groundbreaking film will be directed by a slice of Provolone cheese.

Industry executives were predictably dumbfounded. "I lost my dumb, but then I found it!" said the gleeful head of Paramount Studios in an interview conducted at his home yesterday. The feet of Paramount Studios were less enthused. "We could care less," said the feet. "Nothing much matters to you when you smell like old vegetable soup."

The ordinary Americans on the street were slightly more disturbed by the news. A tall man wrapped in yellow cellophane gave voice to the thoughts of many when he said "What is going on with Walmart? I go in there to buy a handgun and they won't let me because they say they can't legally sell a weapon to a man with Cheerios glued to his face. What is this country coming to? We need to come together as a community and make the streets safe for the kids again. We can't always leave everything up to the Angel of Laundry."

Tom Hanks has just announced that he plans to star in a Saving Private Ryan prequel, based on "The Babysitters' Club."
COURTESY KEN REGAN

But none of the backlash affected Hanks. In an interview from his home televised last evening, he responded to the hoopla with characteristic patience and quiet dignity. "I am Mister Bubble," he said, seated on his white leather couch, holding his wife's hand and gazing calmly into the camera. "I am Mister Bubble."

"We didn't see this one coming at all," Grapes said.

Dredging the lake turned up nothing but 23 other MASSPirg boats, bringing up the question: "Just how polluted is the campus pond?"

"It wouldn't be polluted if it weren't for those damn boats" said 5-year-old Owen Stanislovski, whose father is a premiere environmentalist, but who couldn't answer the phone because "he and mommy are slow dancing in bed and I have to finish my GrapeNuts down here until they're done."

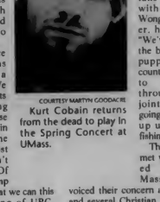
"The screen-door boat of 1993 was a particularly fool- hearty experiment. Argh. we lost some good men and one cute puppy," Grapes said, wistfully. "And the boat made of chocolate... well, I don't know what we were thinking. It ruined a pair of my girlfriend's white khakis."

"Well, color me surprised," Chancellor David K. Scott said from the shore of the pond. "Who knew this was a death trap? Well, fill it in with concrete and we're going to make a rollerderby rink out of this bitch."

Plans for the rollerderby rink are being drawn up by W. Christopher Kane, an architect and consistent third–place finisher in pop–a–shot down at Rafiers. "We basically asked for $20 and a case of Natty Light. I plan to sit on the shore, watch that cement harden, and get plenty drunk. Just me and the dog."

Scott continued: "People think... people, uh... god*damn*, I just lost my train of thought. Oh yeah — people think this is going to be environmentally unsound. Well, the environment can kiss my poop chute. All I know is that I'm getting UPC, but of MassConcerts. who have managed to exume the corpses of some of the most formerly talented dead rock stars of the past years.

I can't wait for flying cars!



John Peters of MassConcerts explains: "The trend of rock acts that have one foot in the grave seems popular...We just decided to take that to the next level," he says referring to the Rolling Stones current tour, for which tickets are in such demand that it costs $300 just to stand outside the stadium.

UPC's unholy alliance with MassConcerts was brought about through a mutual understanding. "We turned down MassConcerts offer to fund the spring concert last year because they were going to bring in corporate vendors. The truth is that we were just pissed off that we didn't think of that first. Of course were going to pimp out the students for all that we can this year," said Justin Wong of UPC. "Besides, we at UPC have no fucking clue what we're doing and couldn't find our collective ass with both hands and a mirror."

After losing 1996 and 1998's Spring Concert to embezzled payroll funds. University Productions and Concerts promises to make it up to the students by bringing in acts that we will never get the opportunity to see again. UPC also publically acknowledges that '97's spring concert really sucked and the two dollar entrance fee was overpriced.

This year's lineup includes G.G. Allin, Ian Curtis reuniting with his old bandmates New Order/Joy Division, Shannon Hoon reuniting with the rest of Blind Melon, and a new supergroup called Posthumous featuring Cliff Burton (formerly of Metallica) and Bon Scott (formerly of AC/DC, and fresh from his tour with Jimi Hendrix and John Bonham on the "Stars who choked on their own vomit" tour). Headlining the show will be Freddie Mercury of Queen, and Kristin Pfaff (formerly of Hole) and Kurt Cobain joining forces in a band called Courtney Killed Us.

Magic and Voodoo was attempted to revive the bodies of the fallen rock stars, but to no avail. Some of the stiffs remained unresponsive, while the few that were revived refused to perform gigs based on already shot, opening sequence, that begin with Rodman walking through the front door announcing, "Honey, I'm home," and then stripping down to his leisurely leather outfit, and screaming, "Carmen where's my dinner you...(series of bleeps). Since ABC is owned by Disney, the show will run during the afternoon, and try to compete with PBS' "Teletubbies" as television's top rated children's show.

Another announcement made by ABC is that the success of "Monday Night Football" will finally be duplicated with "Tuesday Night Football." Since "Monday Night Football" is supposed to show the best game of the week, "Tuesday Night Football" will show the second best game of the week. A spokesman for ABC said, "Well, we know it's not as good as 'MNF', but we have really run out of ideas for new shows, and everything else we came up with pretty much sucks, so enjoy The Saints vs. The Ravens."

ABC is not the only network that's planning to re-use wealth from an already popular show. CBS is so high on their new hit series "60 Minutes Two" that they're going to attempt to gain ratings with "Everybody Loves Raymond Two," "The King of Queens Two" "CBS Evening News with Dan Rather's Clone," and of course "Cosby Three."

While the press was eagerly awaiting FOX's future announcements late in the afternoon, the so-called "minor networks," WB and UPN revealed their plans. UPN plans to give Pauly Shore his own show, because he hasn't failed enough yet, and the WB said that Katie Holmes will be leaving "Dawson's Creek" to move to Amherst and marry a certain Tube Notes columnist.

Corey + Star Wars = $$$

A scene from the new Star Wars film, Episode I: The Phantom Menace.
CHESTER COPPERPOT/COLLEGIAN

By Corey Feldman
Goonie

THE PHANTOM MENACE
Directed by George Lucas with Billy Zane, lots of monsters
Bootleg copy taken by my friend Corey Haim

George Lucas has only shown Star Wars, Episode One: The Phantom Menace — which if you ask me is way too long for a movie title, punk — to a few people, some friends in the business. One was Steven Spielberg. The other was me. I've known George ever since I supplied him with hardcore drugs back in the 80's, when I was 12.

Everyone's making a big deal about the new Star Wars — "Oooh, those special effects!" they say. "Wow, Liam Neeson." they scream. Let me tell you something: It sucks. I've produced better special effects with a paper airplane and some lighter fluid. And my performance as "Mouth" in The Goonies was better than Neeson's in that crappy Holocaust movie any day.

The ads tell you that The Phantom Menace is about the young Darth Vader before he becomes Darth Vader. That's pretty much a trick. The Phantom Menace is really about a guy who wants to get laid. And it really stars Billy Zane, you know, that evil guy in Titanic.

Anyway, Billy wants to have hot sex with a lot of kinky monster women, so he gets this spaceship and takes it up, and finds women, and hits on them.

> "Sometimes you want tacos. Sometimes you want Crystal Pepsi. Either way, you're spending the night on the dumper."

That's the whole movie right there.

In fact, to show you how pitiful this movie is, here's a sample of the script:

BILLY ZANE: So, you wanna go have monster sex?

MONSTER CHICK: No.

BILLY ZANE: You sure? I know some great monster sex moves.

MONSTER CHICK: I don't like you.

BILLY ZANE: C'mon, baby, I'm sexy.

MONSTER CHICK: Go away.

And George Lucas worked 15 years on this? It's horrible, pitiful, and disgraceful. "The Force," as they call it, is really just a innuendo for Billy Zane's monster sex moves.

Which brings us to the special effects. As you can see in the picture, they're not exactly everything we had hoped for. While it's true that they were created on a computer, what Lucas failed to mention is that the computer was a Commadore 64. All the effects are done in Basic.

Contrary to popular belief, the old characters from Star Wars do make an appearance in the new film. Actually, just Mark Hamill, who sneaked on to the set and into the action because he's poor and tired of selling ice cream to little kids.

Take it from me — if you saw my film Bundello of Blood, you've seen it all. Don't go see Star Wars in May. Instead, have a good time by calling my friend Nicole Eggert at 555- 4356.

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

As some of you may know, the last week in March is the time of year for all of the big time TV networks to make announcements about the future of television, and what is going to happen next year. Last Monday morning, the press releases started to role in, as startling, and exciting news brought a lot of hope for the season ahead. So without any further anticipation, here's an inside track on all of the plans for the 1999-2000 TV line-up.

By far the biggest announcement released was made by NBC. Mark your calendar for Thursday, September 16th, at 9:00 p.m., because that's the time when Jerry Seinfeld and his pals make their triumphant return to the airwaves. NBC spokesperson, Jonathan Henderson, quoted Seinfeld as simply exclaiming, "I'm back."

The quote is clearly a parody of Michael Jordan's return to the NBA in 1995, after a two year absence, in which he said the exact same thing. Many reasons were given for the return of the most popular sitcom of all time, with the most prominent being pure boredom. The entire cast has been enjoying the good life, but they all miss each other, and especially miss the million dollars per episode that was paying for their $100,000 cars, and weekly trips to Paris.

It was not stated about how the series will change in the future. The extremely weak series finale ended with the cast members being sentenced to a year in prison, and it seems that the most obvious way to make a return is pick up a year later, and describe the cast's lives after they've spent a year together in jail. Altogether, it should be interesting to see how long it takes for the cast to slip back into their original, money hungry selves, and revert to their old jobs as thinking they're better than everyone else.

Another bombshell that NBC dropped, is that there will be one less friend on their top rated comedy, "Friends." Apparently, the season finale will involve the departure of one of the characters, possibly through death, and the entire upcoming season will revolve around the other friends whining about how awful their lives are, because someone is gone. Though NBC didn't make any official comment about who the exiting cast member will be, they only thing they did say was, "He'll be missed." (or was it. "She'll be missed?" I don't remember, I'm not a very good journalists.)

Moving on to ABC's plans, there will be a brand new sitcom starring Dennis Rodman and Carmen Electra called, "Together Forever." Rodman will reportedly quit the NBA at the end of this season, to devote all his time to this new show. (Well, maybe not all his time, he still has to separate a few hours a day to get over his hangover from the night before, and a few hours a night to create a hangover for the next morning.) The short clips that were shown to the press had an already shot, opening sequence, that begin with Rodman walking through the front door announcing, "Honey, I'm home," and then stripping down to his leisurely leather outfit, and screaming, "Carmen where's my dinner you...(series of bleeps). Since ABC is owned by Disney, the show will run during the afternoon, and try to compete with PBS' "Teletubbies" as television's top rated children's show.

Another announcement made by ABC is that the success of "Monday Night Football" will finally be duplicated with "Tuesday Night Football." Since "Monday Night Football" is supposed to show the best game of the week, "Tuesday Night Football" will show the second best game of the week. A spokesman for ABC said, "Well, we know it's not as good as 'MNF', but we have really run out of ideas for new shows, and everything else we came up with pretty much sucks, so enjoy The Saints vs. The Ravens."

ABC is not the only network that's planning to re-use wealth from an already popular show. CBS is so high on their new hit series "60 Minutes Two" that they're going to attempt to gain ratings with "Everybody Loves Raymond Two," "The King of Queens Two" "CBS Evening News with Dan Rather's Clone," and of course "Cosby Three."

While the press was eagerly awaiting FOX's future announcements late in the afternoon, the so-called "minor networks," WB and UPN revealed their plans. UPN plans to give Pauly Shore his own show, because he hasn't failed enough yet, and the WB said that Katie Holmes will be leaving "Dawson's Creek" to move to Amherst and marry a certain Tube Notes columnist.

The Grateful Dead? No - just dead and very cheap

University Productions and Concerts have announced their plans to include stars that have passed their prime (so to speak), in this year's spring concert — they are all dead.

This bold move was not the idea of UPC, but of MassConcerts. who have voiced their concern about the smell, and several Christian groups opposed the manipulation of the dead artists as immoral. "But we bought them off, now they're happy," said Peters. The real threat comes from the families of the deceased musicians — especially Courtney Love whose high priced lawyers are trained to maim.

Kurt Cobain returns from the dead to play in the Spring Concert at UMass.

"We'll take care of Courtney," said Wong and Peters in unison with devious grins on their faces. "She'll either back off or be an act on our second stage."

Editors Note: Two years ago, the April Fools edition of the Collegian reported that 80's hair metal bands would headline the spring concert. With the staged comeback of such bands as Motley Crue, Skid Row, Dangerous Toys, and Quiet Riot, the Collegian would like to thank UPC for not making this once humorous article into a horrifying reality.

Smith takes Flint & Co. to the rim, baby

After the Massachusetts men's basketball team lost in a Haigis Hoopla exibition match to the Garbage Shots, the Smith College champion team, coach Bruiser Flint's tenure as UMass coach came to a painful end. Not for him but for the UMass fans, who were forced to sit through the 1998–99 season.

The Minutemen fell to the Garbage Shots by a score of 100–63. The Minutemen received a solid effort from Mike Babul who poured in 53 of the Minutemen's 63 points.

After the tough loss coach Flint commented on the game.

"Haigis is a tough place to play, and the Smith College fans came out in force. They are the best fourth man in America," Flint said. "They were a tournament team, they played at Haigis last year and returned everybody."

The Minutemen hung in the first half of the game while Chris Kirkland was in the lineup. But once Mary Margaret Rosencrantz came into the game and schooled the Minutemen with her post moves, the Minutemen had no one who they could bring in to replace Kirkland. The Minutemen took a full time out and thought about bringing Ajmal Basit back, but coach Flint said one Bruiser on the team was bad enough.

"I thought we were in good shape until Chris fouled out, but Rosencrantz has some incredible post moves and we really have no one at her talent level. We would have moved Mike down there to guard her but then we would have had no offense at all," Flint said.

At one point in during game, the Minutemen were up 43– 36, while Raf Cruz was playing the point. But then Jonathan DePina came in for 30 seconds and turned the ball over 52 times allowing the Garbage Shots to go on a 36–4 run. While in, DePina also went 0–6 from the field and fouled three times. When asked about DePina's horrid Bruiser said:

"I love Jonathan DePina, he is doing a good job running the point and he is high school all–american and he's bound to explode for a big game… if someone straps a bopmb to his chest," Bruiser said.

Although he scored the Minutemen's last nine points, Monty Mack was consistently "bitch–slapped" all day by his defender Mary Margaret "Punky" Brewster. After the beating him, Brewster went ghetto and took her jersey and threw his ass into the Gatorade table.

"I thought Monty did a good job, but their is no defending those Garbage girls. They are a great team, and they play desperate. They also have a lot of fire in their belly," Flint said.

After the terrible beating suffered at the hands of the Garbage Shots, UMass Athletic Director Bob Marcum fired Bruiser Flint after going 0–2 in the NCAA tournament in the last three years and not beating anyone in the A–10.

"Nosterdamus said that the world would end in the summer of 1999. I would just like to say that I went out a winner," Flint said. But Marcum, who was also at the press conference, said "I have no idea what this guy is talking about, but he is the worst coach we have ever had."

After Flint stormed out of the press conference followed immediately out of the room by DePina, Marcum dropped another bombshell on the program by annoucing that John Calipari would take over as coach and announcing that Jesse "The Body" Ventura would leave the Minnesota Governship for the team's equipment manager position.

Then Calapari made his first appearance as the head coach of the Minutemen, appearing in a cape and tights, proclaiming, "I knew when I left that I was setting Bruiser up to fail. Camby was gone, the program was stripped, and he was just the random sucker I needed to take over this failing program. But now i'm back. Because it's hard in the NBA. After all, it's a tough place to play."

Calapari finished his speech by saying that he would return the program to national prominence by getting the players "hookers for the road" and "really cool Hummers they can drive around in. We'll see what happens. Just be glad that I'm not Bruiser."

Tomgirl puts on the skirt for upcoming field hockey season

On Wednesday, the UMass field hockey team inked its latest addition to the 1999 squad when Erik Tomgirl agreed come to campus on a full scholarship. Tomgirl is the first male recruit in the program, as well as the first in NCAA history, and should jump right into the starting role vacated by the graduation of Erica Johnston.

The 6–foot 6–inch Tomgirl is a converted offensive lineman from Austin, Texas that football coach Mark Whipple was trying to entice to come to Amherst, but even a National Championship couldn't change his mind on the conversion to field hockey.

"I love the sport," said Tomgirl when asked about the change of heart. "I'm ecstatic about wearing a skirt. I'll finally get to show off my freshly shaven legs."

He changed his mind after visiting the University of Texas after he saw Ricky Williams running people over. "I don't think I could make it as a lineman, my body is much more suited for field hockey," Tomgirl said.

Billy Bob and Mary Tomgirl, his parents, are happy that he is happy. "His primary goal is to go to college to get an education. Being in the trenches in a football game can cause brain damage. I'm a doctor, I want him to be one too. Football could ruin that for him and I don't want that to happen," Billy Bob said.

Although Tomgirl has never played the game his skills are unparalleled. He has pure power and should be able to dominate Atlantic 10 competition right from the beginning. Patty Shea said, "He will be a welcome addition to our program. We finally have a player that will be able to bang around the net and score some garbage goals, much like Cam Neely used to do for the Boston Bruins."

There was one problem with Tomgirl coming UMass, the lockerroom situation, but Athletic Director Bob Marcum rectified that immediately.

Tomgirl will be forced to change in a room full of women. "We thought about putting him the locker room with the mens soccer team, but a lot of team chemistry is created around the locker and in the shower. Excluding him from this would be absurd," Marcum said.

"I love being in the lockerroom. After a hard workout it is good time for bonding," said Tomgirl. "It might be a little different with a bunch of women, but I can handle it. I'm a big boy, as they'll soon find out."

With many starters returning and the addition of a powerhouse recruit Patty Shea looks to in excellent shape for next season. "This is the forst time in years I've been excited about field hockey in the spring. I can't wait to get Erik on the field. He'll be awesome. The girls will learn to love him, he's like a giant teddy bear."

WNBA to kiss the Claw's "sweet butt"

By Sarah Smith

ROCKY TOP — Reports that Tennessee women's basketball senior Chamique Holdsclaw has decided to forgo her future career in the WNBA and submit herself to the NBA draft In June leaked out of Knoxville, Tenn. yesterday.

Holdsclaw was just honored as the Associated Press women's basketball National Player of the Year award for a record fourth straight year after averaging 59.9 points per game to go along with 22 rebounds and 36 assists per game. The four time All–American also shot an amazing 86 percent from the floor.

"Obviously I am sick of playing with these silly girls'" Holdsclaw said. "You think I spent my entire childhood in sand lots and glass–covered blacktops for this?

"My grandmother didn't want any boys to touch me until I turned 22 and here I am, ready to be touched and pushed and jabbed in the chest by the biggest men in the world, just like every woman in my family has."

When reached for comment, Grandma Holdsclaw simply said proudly, "That's my girl!"

Word spread fast around the league as the L.A. Lakers, Chicago Bulls, L.A. Clippers and the New Jersey Nets all expressed interest in 'Meek', as she is often called.

"I want this girl, however meek she is," Clipper coach–for– the–day Johnny Oppotomus said. "I am shameless. My team can't even win 10 percent of their games! Of course I want her bony ass out there!

"What a coup that would be to have 'The Claw,' like in that movie with Jim Carrey… Liar Liar."

Laker team owner Jerry West, who also owns the WNBA L.A. Sparks, thought she would benefit the most if she were to don a Lakers rather than Sparks, jersey.

"Professionally speaking, there's no way she could hang with the big boys I've got," West said, referring to center Shaquille O'Neal and Dennis Rodman. "Though she is sure to score more with the male–dominated crowd of the Lakers rather than the Sparks. Ain't nuthin' but little girls and their clueless mothers every friggin Sunday."

The Claw agreed with West.

"I hear that they bag better weed," the Claw said about Rodman and Rick Fox. "I bet all the Mystics [referring to WNBA squad], or whatever lame–ass name they are, yeah, I told them to put up or shut up. They can shove their lousy Lady's Footlocker and Monistat One endorsements."

Much of the hoopla brings back memories of Nancy Lieberman–Cline's stint with the high–class, super–exciting entertainment that is the Harlem Globetrotters.

Lieberman–Cline wished her predecessor well, and hoped that she would take all the attention in stride.

"Hey, the sex is good. In fact, it's best after practice because it helps you increase not only your stamina but your teammates. And of course, it's inspiration for your boys.

"The locker room was never the same after I left and I wish you good luck in doing the same" she said.

Notorious Knick bad boy Latrell Sprewell said that he is glad to see a woman joining the league.

"Hey, that's an ass I won't mind kickin' a few times," Sprewell said.

The only person with negative feedback so far is Tennessee evil–looking blue–green eyelined coach Pat Summit, who let escape from her thin, straight Carnation Pink lipsticked mouth, " I don't give a *#@$ what she does with herself. She can go play Double–A baseball with the Birmingham Barons for all I care. I got a new locker room out of her."

The Claw said she felt that no ill–will to the WNBA, she just couldn't imagine herself possibly donning the purple and yellow color scheme of the Sparks. When reminded that the Lakers shared the same colors. The Claw muttered, "Whatever. As long as I don't have to put up with pretty girl Lisa Leslie and her modeling exploits, that's good enough for my ass."

Celtics Coach Rick Pitino admitted that he might have some interest in The Claw who scored 16,000 in her college career.

"You go, sistah," Pitino said.

At the end of the press conference, The Claw speculated a future if she should not make it in the NBA.

"I think I would like to make beautiful music with former New Kid Jon Knight. He was the favorite of all my girlfriends in the hood."

Sex advice from your mom

What is the best way to put on a condom?

Why would you want to put on a condom? Are you sexually active? What a way to break it to me. I have to sit down. Next thing you know, your little brother will be smoking hashish. Tommy! Are you smoking hashish. Why are you trying to tear this family apart, whore?

How do I not prevent STDs?

Once again… Well, I'll say this: Grandma used to say, "If you don't put your hand in a beehive, there's a good chance you won't get stung." By the way, Grandma is right now spinning in her grave.

What's a "g–spot?"

Is this what Cosmo is teaching you? Are you trying to send me to an early grave? I don't know if I'll ever stop blushing, now that I know my child is so promiscuous. You think Randy hurts Mrs Papadopolis this way?

How do you know when it's love?

Oh, now finally a question suitable for your mom. Whew. Well, I remember being in a crowded movie theater watching "Dr. Zhivago" with your father about five months before he proposed. Halfway through the movie he put his hand on mine, we looked each other in the eyes and… next thing I knew we had smuck into a utility closet and my face was pressed into cold tile. Like an animal. Oh, the hands on that man, bless his heart. Whew. I get a little weak thinking about it. Oh, my. What was the question again?

Your mom sleeps with me often and rarely contributes to the Collegian.

Embarrasing true life confessions!

I was a wee lass back in Scotland. I bought the most beautiful prom dress, dazzling white. So I went to the prom with a friend of mine who I had such a crush on. OhmyGOD! So I get there and we're sitting there and I realize, jumpin' jahosefats! It's that time of the month. I couldn't believe it. And my friend was such a hottie! I just wanted to die.

So I had this board of trustees meeting and it was very important. I was foolish enough to believe I could have some pop rocks and soda pop without consequence. If only I could go back. Well, I'm sitting there and I'm sitting next to the cutest trustee and what do you know? I pass gas. So the trustee says, "Whoa! Sounds like someone had to let out the dog!" I just wanted to die.

Then we said minorities are bad.

The last game of the season, and I come out of the bathroom with toilet paper stuck to my shoe! Oh my God! It was almost as embarasing as losing by four to that wheelchair team. It was bad enough, but I also forgot to flush the toilet! And to make matters worse, my 12th man says "Coach, you stunk up the pooper good." I wanted to say "Ross, go to hell!" but he's so cute. HORRORSCOPES

ARIES (think they're hot stuff) — You will inevitably die. Might as well eat Pork rinds and chew tobacco. Go to the Dining Commons on Shrimp Fiesta night! Have unsafe sex! Live a little, prune–face!

TAURUS (Da' Bull) — "Life is a sleazy stranger sitting at the end of the bar," said Ani DiFranco, and his name is Taurus. Taurus, you're not as cute as you think you are. Yes, you look good in a pair of blue jeans but that will only get you a room in Southwest. Nobody is sweatin' you. Actually, you're kind of creepy.

GEMINI (Ooh, Siamese Twins) — You're thinking all day, "I could go for a nice piece of ass." But yet you go to sleep alone yet again. Number one — get your head out of your pants. Number two — …damn! I forget and I dropped my joint. Number four — stop objectifiying women. The chicks don't dig it.

CANCER (not cool) — Wine is fine, but liquor's quicker. So said your dad the night you were conceived.

LEO (DiCrapio) — Yes Leo, we know, you liked the Backstreet Boys before they were "big." So cutting edge; why don't you go pierce yourself again. I hear they're having a sale at Hot Topic.

VIRGO (not getting any) — Think of life as a big stinky pile of poop. And every once in a while, you step in that poop, and no matter how long you sit on the porch of experience, cleaning your shoe with the stick of wisdom and toilet paper of idealism, there will always be poop in the treads. And you're thinking, "Damn, I just got these shoes at Zanna." Well, ain't that life.

LIBRA (damn hippie) — You are a big, bright, shining star in the constellation of life. You are eternally wonderful. Oh Libras, poor misunderstood beauty queens. Someone by a babbling brook is longing for you. Go buy yourself some chocolate fudge, you luscious piece of taffy, you.

SCORPIO (moody bitch) — You know what's cool? You're the most sweet of all the candies. Yum, Scorpio! So I want a sandwich, Sagittarius, and I'd like mayo on it.

SAGITTARIUS (saggy butt) — No matter how many times you say "But she's almost 18," it is not cool to masturbate to Britney Spears. Not cool. Like the Republican Club.

BINKY THE DOORMAT (whenever the mood strikes) — Oh, so you don't know what to do with your life. I feel for you. Aww, well, we all have problems with our families — it's not uncommon. Mmh, yes… So, is there a chance I'll get to have sex with you tonight? I'm quite good. Oh, well, then someone's walking home.

CAPRICORN (likes pretty monkies) — Let me tell you something about yourself: you're a little bit shy, unsure of yourself. You keep your friends close and are worried about your future. It's like I know you, right? Well, that's because I sleep with your mom. I'm kidding. There's not much sleeping going on!

AQUARIUS (more like a queer–lus) — I like to drink Sprite and eat pretzels. I like to dance the samba in empty elevators. I often think about the political climate in Zambia. What? What did you say Aquarius? You aren't interested in my life? It's you, you, you, isn't it Mr. Greedypants? Well, guess what? I have feelings too.

PISCES (smelly like a dead fish) — Shit, shower and shave. Enjoy It — it's the high point of your day, Pisces. Shit, shower and shave.

Hampshire students end fasting protest with meal

ROBERTO DELGADO / COLLEGIAN

At their "last break breakfast" yesterday, Hamshire College students invited UMass chancellor David K. Scott, among others, and represented him with a cardboard cut-out.

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Hampshire College students held a "break/fast" yesterday morning, to mark the end of a protest in which students fasted to raise money for low–income University of Massachusetts student parents.

Yesterday, over 200 Hampshire students fasted to protest UMass Chancellor David K. Scott's January decision to revoke $50,000 worth of housing vouchers for low–income student parents. Hampshire Dining Services agreed to donate $6 to the UMass Student Parent Survival Fund for every student that went without food. Their efforts netted over $1200.

Yesterday morning the students held a "fast break breakfast." Their intended guest of honor, "In the skewed spirit that embodies April Fool's Day", was Chancellor Scott himself. Lo and behold, Scott did attend the breakfast — in the form of a cardboard cut–out operated by student Joe Huff–Hannon.

"Scott" was joined by cut–outs of UMass President William Bulger, and a representative of the state legislature, who pointed at Scott as he "danced" for them.

"You students are blinded by your privilege," said "Scott."

"You may think a person can only be happy on a neurosurgeon's salary, but I tell you, I know plenty of people who have long, fulfilling careers as secretaries and janitors."

When questioned about his commitment to low–income students, however, the "chancellor" finally broke down.

"I never should have done it," he said. "I'm a bad, bad man. And Bulger and the legislature — they're bad men too. We need to do something about them. But first, can I have one of those pancakes?"

"Yeah," muttered one student. "A big pancake for a big asshole."

Despite these moments of levity, the students were completely serious in their commitment to low–income students, many of whom are forced to go without food in order to pay for their tuition, housing and childcare.

At the breakfast, the students reflected on their experiences.

"I had a really hard time concentrating for classes and doing homework," said Hampshire student Sarah Appleby. "I'm amazed that there are people who don't eat every day and still manage to take care of their kids, and hold down a job, and go to school to earn their degree."

Helene Busby, one of the protest's organizers, agreed.

"I think everybody who fasted began to understand what it's like not to have an unlimited amount of food, and to actually suffer because of it," she said. Busby was one of approximately 10 Hampshire students who had gone a step further and started their fasting on Monday.

The UMass Graduate Student Senate had petitioned the chancellor in December for emergency housing vouchers for low–income graduate students, many of whom were about to be kicked off of state welfare rolls. The chancellor approved $50,000 for the vouchers, only to revoke them the next month, when several members of the Massachusetts State Legislature characterized them as an attempt to use state funds to offset welfare reform and temporarily blocked approval of the University's contract.

A perspective on the three servicemen at risk overseas

By B.J. Reyes
Associated Press

While Serb television showed images of three U.S. servicemen captured in Yugoslavia, their relatives and friends back home yesterday prayed for the soldiers' safe return and described them as brave young men who were proud to serve their country.

The three soldiers, part of a NATO peacekeeping force, were captured Wednesday near the Yugoslav–Macedonian border.

Yugoslavia's state news agency reported the three will go on military trial today, a move President Clinton condemned as a violation of international treaties.

The Pentagon identified the soldiers as Staff Sgt. Andrew A. Ramirez, 24, of Los Angeles; Staff Sgt. Christopher J. Stone, 25, of Smiths Creek, Mich.; and Spc. Steven M. Gonzales, 21, of Huntsville, Texas.

Though Gonzales appeared battered and bruised, his family expressed relief he didn't look worse.

His parents, Gilbert and Rosie Gonzales, are both employees of the Texas corrections system, and prisons statewide were asked to tie yellow ribbons to their entrances until the soldiers are released.

Friends and former teachers said Gonzales was a likable, bright athlete during his high school days in Palestine, 90 miles north of Huntsville in east Texas. He graduated in 1995 and won a scholarship to Texas A&M, but left after a year to pursue a dream of joining an elite Army corps.

"He was the type of student you'd love to have: hard–working, always happy, funny," said teacher Kay Stroud, who had Gonzales in her advanced placement biology class his senior year.

A friend, Kelly Williams, recognized her former classmate as soon as she saw the Serbian TV pictures.

"Unfortunately, he's got rather big ears. He used to wiggle his ears for us and make us laugh," she said. "That's how I knew it was him. I was like, you could not mistake those ears."

Stone, whose wife and 5–year–old son live in San Antonio, was described by former teachers and classmates as a talented athlete also blessed with the "gift of gab."

"I'm surprised he couldn't talk his way out of this," said Ken Marzka, Stone's cross–country coach at Capac Community Junior–Senior High School, about 50 miles northeast of Detroit. "Chris is a tough kid … he never quit," Marzka said. "He never was great (as a runner)," Marzka said. "But when push came to shove, he got tougher and tougher. Chris is going to be just fine."

School counselor Kathy Kish said Stone was well–liked by students and teachers. His membership in Students Against Drunk Driving showed his concern for his fellow students, she said. "It doesn't surprise us a bit that he's serving our country on a peace mission," she said.

In Los Angeles, outside the modest home of Ramirez's divorced father, Andy Ramirez, neighbors prayed for the captured staff sergeant and reminisced about the "all–American kid" they watched grow up.

American soldiers deemed "POWs" Clinton orders release by Milosevic

By John Diamond
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton said yesterday he holds Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic responsible for the capture of three Army soldiers near the Macedonian–Yugoslav border, warning him to "make no mistake" and release them immediately.

The United States initially branded the capture an illegal abduction on the assumption that Serb forces had crossed into Macedonia. But later yesterday, Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon called them "prisoners of war," raising the specter that the soldiers could be held until the end of hostilities. The Pentagon was investigating the possibility that the soldiers had blundered across the Macedonian border into Yugoslavia.

"We consider them to be POWs," Bacon said. "We assert that they are covered by the Geneva Convention."

Yugoslavia said the soldiers were invaders and would face criminal trial before a military court today. The announcement added a new and unsettling element to an expanding

Government offers funding for police, etc. at schools

By Anjetta McQueen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — To combat violence and drugs, 50 communities nationwide will share up to $180 million in federal grants this year for school–based anti–violence programs, mental health services and police officers.

The departments of Education, Justice and Health and Human Services are pooling money granted by Congress, agency officials announced yesterday. Applications for the Safe Schools/Healthy Students program are due June 1.

"There so many components that go into making schools safe," said George Raiss, lobbyist for the 37,000–student Norfolk, Va., school district. "If the grants enable us to put all of our efforts under one umbrella, then this is something we'd definitely go after."

The Justice Department's share this year includes $80 million from a program to hire community police officers. But officials stressed that putting more police in schools isn't the plan's focus.

"No one group can do it by themselves," Attorney General Janet Reno said. "Police chiefs and officers tell me… we've got to do more in terms of prevention. Schools… can't teach their children unless they feel that children are safe."

Reno said the medical community must address the mental health issues that bring about some violence.

In Anaheim, Calif., police officers work in the schools to build a rapport with students, so if they get into trouble with the law, they deal with officers they know and trust. But when it is time for counseling, the 30,000–student district has trouble finding affordable mental health services.

"They don't do a lot of volunteer work," said Bon Montenegro, safe schools coordinator for the Anaheim Union High School District, which covers Anaheim, Buena Park and other cities. "That's the area we really need help in."

The grants come out of last fall's White House conference on school safety where President Clinton called for a stronger federal role in violence prevention.

The administration hopes Congress will approve $120 million more over the next two years.

After highly publicized shootings in the 1997–98 school year in towns such as West Paducah, Ky., Jonesboro, Ark., and Springfield, Ore., schools were forced to examine how to guarantee children's safety and address public thinking that deadly youth violence is on the rise.

"Those tragic incidences… really focused the nation on school violence," Education Secretary Richard W. Riley.

The latest figures available, from the 1996–97 school year, show 10 percent of the nation's public schools reported violent crimes. Most incidents were concentrated in larger and urban districts. Reno said the grants would be available to communities of all sizes: "This type of tragedy happens everywhere."

Merger protested

By Jeannine Aversa
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The nation's top telecommunications regulator told SBC Communications and Ameritech Corp. yesterday that he has "serious concerns" about their planned merger and whether it would serve the public interest.

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Bill Kennard, in letters to the companies' chiefs, did not address whether the agency would try to block the proposed $57 billion merger if his concerns are not alleviated.

But Kennard said he wants discussions between the companies and commission staff to begin to explore "whether it would be possible to craft conditions" addressing his concerns.

Kennard did not elaborate on what those conditions should be. The merger, cleared by the Justice Department last month, would create the nation's largest local phone company that would control 57 million telephone lines — or one–third of the country's local lines — spread across 13 states.

Among other things, Kennard asked how the commission can be assured that the merger "will not interfere with the companies' willingness and ability" to open their local phone markets to other companies that want to provide competing local phone and other communications services.

Kennard also wanted to know how the FCC can be assured that the public will receive the benefits the companies say will result from the union.

Specifically, Kennard was referring to the companies' claim that they need to combine to provide local phone and other services in 30 targeted markets outside their combined 13–state local region. Such a move would have SBC–Ameritech

News from below the border

MEXICO CITY (AP) — A man suspected of killing six women in the northern border city of Juarez has declared his innocence and blamed another man for the slayings, a Mexico City newspaper reported yesterday.

Jesus Manuel Guardado Marquez, a 27-year-old former bus driver who transported factory workers in Juarez, was arrested last weekend in the neighboring state of Durango. Investigators said they hoped he would shed light on the killings of scores of women in the industrial city over the last six years.

The daily La Jornada reported that Guardado told a criminal court judge Wednesday that he had consensual sex with the victims but denied killing them. He said a fellow bus driver, whom he did not identify, was addicted to heroin and killed the women. A 14-year-old girl told officials that Guardado beat and raped her last month and left her for dead. The girl, a factory worker, said she was the last passenger on Guardado's bus when he veered from the normal route and attacked her.

Police say about 100 women, mostly teens, have been killed since 1993 in Juarez, across the border from El Paso, Texas. Independent groups say the number could be as high as 192. The victims were raped or sexually brutalized in 54 of those cases.

•RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil — The city's most famous beaches, Copacabana and Ipanema, have been deemed unfit for bathing because of leaks in sewer pipes, local media reported yesterday.

The same problem frustrated hundreds of thousands of bathers during the Carnival only six weeks ago.

The state's environmental agency has recommended bathing only at beaches far to the east of the city.

The situation will only get worse when new repairs begin April 12. The government says 105 cubic feet of sewage per second will be discharged into the ocean during the repairs, which are not expected to finished until May.

City officials were unavailable for comment yesterday due to the Easter holiday.

•CHILPANCINGO, Mexico — Thousands of leftist party activists blocked streets in the Guerrero state capital yesterday in a failed effort to stop the inauguration of a new governor they accuse of stealing his election victory.

Rene Juarez of the ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party was sworn into office in a Chilpancingo auditorium while angry crowds chanted outside.

Supporters of the Democratic Revolution Party claim Juarez stole his Feb. 7 victory through ballot fraud and by buying votes in the poorest regions of the rugged Pacific coast state.

Juarez denies the charges, and on Tuesday, the nation's top electoral court upheld his victory as valid.

Riot squads stood at street barricades armed with tear gas, batons and plastic shields but there were no reports of violence.

•LIMA, Peru — Police have seized 2.3 tons of cocaine destined for Spain hidden under bags of frozen fish in a warehouse near Lima, the largest seizure of cocaine this year in Peru, authorities said yesterday.

Police estimate the cocaine would be worth $105 million on Europe's streets.

Warehouse workers in the Lima port of Callao found the cocaine Wednesday night during a routine inspection, a police spokesman said. The owner of the cargo and the truck driver have been arrested.

Preliminary investigations indicate the cocaine was brought to the Callao warehouse by truck from the northern port of Paita, 560 miles northwest of Lima, police said.

Balkan conflict that the Clinton administration struggled yesterday to explain. Mixed with images of Kosovar Albanian refugees fleeing from apparent Yugoslav "ethnic cleansing" operations were television pictures apparently from Pristina, the Kosovar provincial capital, showing the three American soldiers in captivity. They bore facial cuts and bruises.

NATO airstrikes, meanwhile, continued across a broad spectrum of targets yesterday, including a major bridge across the Danube River, a Yugoslav army unit in central Kosovo, an ammunition dump and fuel storage facility. Bacon said there were signs Yugoslav forces were low on fuel. Clinton pledged to see the Yugoslav mission through despite the hazards.

The Pentagon announced that Defense Secretary William Cohen ordered 13 F-117A stealth fighter-bombers dispatched to the region this weekend to join 11 of the radar-evading planes already operating over Yugoslavia. One is a replacement for the F-117A that was apparently shot down Saturday near Belgrade.

"The Serb air defenses are robust and remain so," Bacon said, thus the need for more stealth planes.

The new fighters bring the total of U.S. aircraft to 220 out of 400 NATO warplanes.

As for the captured soldiers, Bacon said the investigation was continuing to determine exactly who abducted them and from where they were taken. He asserted they were entitled to POW status "at a minimum," and could be eligible for immediate release if they were captured in Macedonia.

The Army is revamping its patrol and security procedures for the roughly 400 soldiers conducting a peacekeeping and observation mission in Macedonia, Bacon said. Among other things, the Pentagon is concerned that even within Macedonia, soldiers could face hostile activity from Serbs angry over the NATO strikes.

Clinton dispatched Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott to the Balkans to assess the effect of the Kosovo crisis on neighboring countries.

competing against fellow Bell companies.

The companies say they will become more efficient and financially able to invade markets outside their region, which they contend they cannot do separately.

Kennard also asked how they can assure the commission that the merger will improve "overall consumer welfare."

By law, the FCC must review proposed mergers to determine whether they will serve the public interest — a broad legal standard.

"... at this stage I have serious concerns about whether your proposal satisfies this requirement," Kennard said in letters to SBC Chairman Edward Whitacre Jr. and Ameritech Chairman Richard Notebaert.

Ameritech spokeswoman Lisa Kim responded: "This is an opportunity to put forth the many benefits of this pro-competition, pro-consumer merger." She said Ameritech believes the FCC will approve the deal. SBC had no immediate comment.

Kennard said he would like to begin discussions — the contents of which would be made public — this month and conclude by late June. The FCC could rule on the merger sometime thereafter. This was the first time Kennard has sent such a letter to companies involved in a merger.

Consumer groups and long-distance companies want the FCC to block the merger, contending it would thwart local phone competition and the prospect of lower prices.

Burlington man lands contract to immortalize Joe

WOBURN, Mass. (AP) — A Massachusetts sculptor has hit a home run in landing a contract to memorialize one of baseball's greats — Joe DiMaggio.

Sculptor Bob Shure of Burlington has been asked to complete a bronze relief of DiMaggio. The bronze portrait will be placed in Yankee Stadium alongside other memorials to legends including Babe Ruth and Lou Gehrig.

"To say I was thrilled was an understimation," Shure told the Daily Times Chronicle of Woburn after being selected to do the portrait of DiMaggio, who died March 8.

Shure has made a clay mold of the portrait, which was presented to Yankees owner George Steinbrenner. The next step in the design will be a plaster model, then the bronze portrait itself.

The portrait will eventually stand in the stadium's hallowed center field area behind the home run walls.

Shure has previously sculpted Boston Red Sox greats.

He made reliefs of slugger Ted Williams for the tunnel named after him and another for pitcher Cy Young on Huntington Avenue in Boston.

Shire, whose studio is in Woburn, also worked on the Irish Famine Memorial on the Freedom Trail in Boston.

The dedication of the DiMaggio relief is slated for April 25. DiMaggio's family is scheduled to be there, as are Steinbrenner and Shure.

DiMaggio, who died at 84, was immortalized in song and literature, a man respected as much for his dignity as for his accomplishments during 13 seasons with the Yankees. His 56-game hitting streak in 1941, one of the greatest feats in all sports, is still a record.

The wording on the relief for DiMaggio will read: Joseph Paul DiMaggio, "The Yankee Clipper," 1914-1999. Recognized as Baseball's "Greatest Living Player."

The relief will also show DiMaggio's lifetime batting average of .325 and note that he won the Most Valuable Player awards in 1939, 1941 and 1947.

It will also pay tribute to DiMaggio's other achievements, including his selection to the All-Star game 13 times and his American League batting titles in 1939 and 1940.

Cell aids bone marrow growth

By Paul Recer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Researchers have isolated from adult bone marrow a master cell that can be directed to grow bone or cartilage, a laboratory feat that experts call a major step toward learning to make replacement parts for ailing or aged bodies.

The researchers at Osiris Therapeutics in Baltimore report in the journal Science that they isolated a single cell, called a mesenchymal stem cell, and then grew it into a colony of more than a million cells that could be induced to produce bone, cartilage or fat.

Other experts in the rapidly expanding field of stem cell research applauded the achievement.

"The fact that they can (isolate) a precursor cell like that, and direct it to produce specific cell types, is quite an advance," said Dr. James A. Thomson of the University of Wisconsin, a noted pioneer in stem cell research. "It may be that such cells can eventually be used for therapy and that would be quite exciting."

Stem cells are the body's building blocks. Some, such as pluripotent stem cells, come only from embryos and their use in research is opposed by many people.

Other stem cells, such as the mesenchymal cells used by Osiris, are produced in adults.

But only the pluripotent stem cells from embryos are thought to be capable of growing into any tissue in the body. The mesenchymal stem cells are the parent lines for bone, cartilage, fat, tendon and muscle.

News for the idiots

It finally happened this week. The Republican Club took careful aim and successfully shot themselves in the foot. In case you missed it, the Republican Club newsletter, The Minuteman, was published on Tuesday. I have never seen such a collection of pure bull in my entire life.

Let's begin with the first page. On the cover page, a picture of Charles Manson appears next to Bill Clinton. Both men have swastikas on their foreheads and, according to the article, they are both very bad men.

Brian Lohnes

To place the president next to Charles Manson is bad. To have him sporting a piece of Nazi propaganda and a symbol of hate on his forehead is just plain stupidity. The title to the article reads, "Sex, Drugs and Rock 'n Roll: The battle to be the most dangerous man alive" and it is a direct comparison of the two men and their lives. The piece was written by Brandon J. Beane and I am still perplexed as to why anyone would be willing to attach their name to something as mindless as this.

Throughout the article, the author chooses to make unfounded claims that rely not on fact but on his own views such as, "It is quite possible, as a result of both men's noted promiscuity, that unknown offspring litter the nation". This is only the tip of the iceberg as far as unfounded and outrageous statements go.

The next wonderfully unbiased claim tries to convince the reader that the president has an STD because he is a sex-crazed maniac. "With a sexual history like Clinton's, it's not too much of a leap to believe he is or has been infected with some sort of STD." And this is the real kicker: "Ever notice his irregular weight loss, his reddish complexion or how sickly he looks frequently." I think someone has a crush! I don't think anyone in America pays as close attention to Bill Clinton as Beane does.

This has to be one of the worst and most unfounded things I have ever read. If one wants to talk sexual problems, why not look close to home, Mr. Beane? Bob Livingston, Bob Packwood, and a list of other imminute Republicans have obviously had their own sexual problems.

The most awful claims come next: "Manson has never been convicted or even charged with using his hands in the commission of a murder; he ordered his 'family' to do his dirty work. Even the most fringe Clinton bashers do not believe he shot Vince Foster in the head, he had an accomplice commit the act." He has just said that our president is an accessory to murder and he orchestrated a murder plot. Bravo! Men, you have a wonderful publication here.

> "I think someone has a crush! I don't think anyone in America pays as close attention to Bill Clinton as Beane does."

I am amazed that someone thought that this was worthy of printing, let alone a front page story. Actually, based on the rest of the writing, I guess that this did deserve front page status. The Republican Club under the blindly obnoxious leadership of Paul Ferro, has reached a new all-time low with this publication. Other columns and articles in this rag are entitled, "News for the niggardly", "Destruction of campus community", and "Sexuality, a matter for the bedroom". These are but a few of the intolerant, outrageous and unfounded columns in this sad newsletter.

The most glaringly wrong column besides the first one is the one entitled, "Sexuality, a matter for the bedroom". This is basically an attack on homosexuals. "If homosexual propaganda spreads at nearly the same pace as last year, we are going to need a heterosexual 'coming out'." Are you afraid that an army of angry homosexuals is going to rise up and carry you off to their evil gay lair and make you gay?

I am embarrassed for you and your organization. You have insulted our intelligence and alienated yourselves even farther away from the campus population (if that's even possible). If anyone sees these papers, please deposit them in the trash where they belong — you will be doing all of us a favor.

The independent women

I live in an all-girls dorm. It is a dorm full of estrogen and raging hormones. I like to refer to it as the "maxi pad."

Take a stroll down my hallway on any given day and you will be attacked. Someone will stop you to listen to their crises, to cry to you, to vent or to have a partner in a Ben and Jerry's binge feast. The reasons for their crises? Simple... in a hall of twenty girls, more than half have some form of a significant other.

Take a minute and ask yourself exactly what era we are living in. Obviously, the answer is the twentieth century and the fact is that the new millennium is rapidly approaching. Society is supposed to be striving for these new, futuristic ideals, right? So how come I feel like women are stuck in the era of poodle skirts and varsity sweaters when it comes to dealing with the opposite sex?

It's 1999; shouldn't all women be fiercely independent and joined together against the stupid games that both sexes play on each other? Shouldn't we be past the whole "he said, she said" scene? Instead, I walk into my hall where every fifteen minutes someone is analyzing the conversation she just had with her boyfriend, the look he gave her, the way he breathed wrong, or the way he broke wind. Each girl will tell me story after story and then ask, "So what do you think it means?" I don't know what it means — maybe he just has gas, for God's sake!

For many of my friends, having a boyfriend is the focal point of their lives; when he's happy, she's happy, when he's sad, she's sad. I know lots of girls who actually make their schedules around their boyfriends. Have you ever watched your friend stare at the telephone for hours waiting for a phone call, until they actually call up the phone company to see if their boyfriend's phone is working? It's a sad sight to witness, let me tell you.

Watching all my otherwise sane friends make themselves insane over the other sex, I stopped to ask the question, am I the odd one or are they? Am I annoyed because they have this long term, "loving" relationship when I find enjoyment in my macaroni and cheese and my fish, Mr. Bingles? I pondered this... and decided no, that's not it.

Shannon Quirk

I'm annoyed because I was raised to be independent and I never felt that I needed a boy to complete me, make me feel secure, or to make me feel happy. I always felt that they were a nice added bonus, but not the center of my life — which is why I was getting so frustrated watching my friends put up with unbelievable emotional baggage from boys just for the sake of having someone. Why do they feel this massive need to be with someone?

The more I thought about it, the more I realized I can't blame my friends for not wanting to be single. Not that being single is bad (trust me, I'm a big fan). However, look at what society has shoved down our throats since we were little girls. Open any women's magazine and it's all about what to do to snag the guy; the clothes to wear, the seductive looks, the way to walk and the personality to fake. If they're not telling you what to do to get the guy, they are telling you how to keep the guy by intercepting his every move.

If you think I'm exaggerating, pick up the latest issue of Cosmo. No wonder my friends circle their calendars for magazine deliveries — they are the Bible when it comes to decoding men. We are told that a relationship is what can make a person feel great, that a new dress and a new man can make you feel like a million bucks. Whatever happened to making yourself feel like a million bucks, or was that ever even a concept? When a woman doesn't have a man in her life, she is usually made to feel that something is wrong with her. Perfect examples are those annoying people who tell you that if you haven't found a husband by thirty, you never will. Just look at every sitcom that's about single people; they are always made to look like completely neurotic, inadequate human beings.

I'm not trying to be one of those people who blames everything on society and media images, but you can't dismiss the major impact they have had on our lives. I mean, how else can you explain the whole fashion disaster of the eighties? What I am saying is that I think that people should try to focus on fixing themselves rather than on having someone else fix them.

I think women need to stop analyzing their lives, and just let some things be. Women need to be applauded for not taking crap from guys instead of being told to give them one more chance. Relationships should be a mutual sharing of love, trust and respect. That's what real love, and a real long-term loving relationship, is. Maybe if magazines taught us about that instead of the right lipstick shade, the world — or at least my hall — would be a less hysterical place. In the meantime, someone find me a spoon, there's a gallon of Chunky Monkey and a teary-eyed friend calling my name.

U.S. made right decision

Despite my relatively liberal stance on most other issues, I have been unable to throw my support behind those who protest the current U.S involvement in Kosovo, a small Yugoslavian province that most of us know nothing about. Simply put, the Serbian nationalists, led by Slobodan Milosevic, have decided that anyone who does not fit their racial ideal cannot exist in their society. To this end, they have exiled and killed thousands upon thousands of Muslims, Albanians and anyone else who fails to meet their standards of racial purity. Is any of this sounding familiar? How are the actions of the Serbian nationalists in 1999 any different from those of German nationalists in 1939?

Paul Martinez

> "How are the actions of the Serbian nationalists in 1999 any different from those of German nationalists in 1939?"

Looking for the jokes? You probably won't find many here, although Serbian nationals were photographed over the weekend holding up a sign that read "Sorry we shot down your plane — we didn't know it was supposed to be invisible." Gee, I never knew fascists had a sense of humor. I bet Hitler was a riot at SS parties, especially after a few handfuls of amphetamines.

Despite the United States' long history of unwise and imperialistic military intervention in other countries' affairs, this case is different. For once, we are not deceived by the military-industrial complex into thinking that a war over oil or the rise of a communist regime halfway around the world is just. For once, we can look at our actions in another country and say, "This is right." For the first time I can remember, I am proud that my country is doing the right thing rather than the popular thing.

There is no media fanfare over this conflict, though — not compared to the hyper-patriotic chest-thumping that preceded the Gulf War. There will never be a t-shirt worn in any mall in America bearing the slogan "I'd walk a mile to smoke a Serb." This conflict, lacking the economic motivations of our last effort, will never have the same amount of support.

Instead of a faceless Arab enemy and an assault on our bloated way of life, we are drawn into a complex and difficult maze of ancient enmities and genocidal violence. Once before, we had the chance to stop the extermination of an oppressed people at least in part. Our government, however, chose not to get involved and eleven million people — six million of them Jews — died at the hands of the German war machine.

History can only lead us to ask "What if?," but here we have a chance to do what is right. We have tried diplomacy over and over again, and it has failed. While Yugoslavia in the late 1990s is not the same as Germany in the late 1930s, we learned a lesson here; do not try to appease a tyrant. That is what Milosevic is, and he has left NATO with no choice but to use force.

However, there's another reason that America should be involved. This conflict is, in part, our fault. We supported Milosevic's government after the collapse of the Communist Yugoslavian government in the early nineties. As in so many other cases, American policy chose to support the first non-Communist leader to emerge, regardless of his background in the ruling elite of the old Yugoslavia or his nationalist beliefs. As a result, the blame for the ethnic conflicts of Yugoslavia — whether Serb versus Croat, Muslim or ethnic Albanian — are placed on our doorstep. To do anything other than push the nationalist government of Yugoslavia out of power is to accept responsibility for the deaths of thousands more innocent people.

Korn & Co. dish out values

FAMILY VALUES '98
Various Artists
Immortal/Epic

By Matthew Nixon
Collegian Staff

Korn and company criss-crossed the nation last year dishing out their view of the world to the youth of America. This collection, featuring six of the bands on the tour, serves as a fine souvenir for those who made it, and allows all who stayed at home to experience over an hour of the cream of today's metal/industrial/alternative/hip-hop sounds.

The sound of the frenzied crowd in Fairfax, Virginia and New Orleans, Louisiana can be heard throughout the collection. DJ C-Minus presents short interludes of scratching between the different acts. Opening acts get things going. The intensity builds and builds in time for Korn's portion of the CD. Incubus kicks things off with the hard and heavy "New Skin" before three songs from industrial-sounding Orgy, who are riding the modern rock charts with their cover of an eighties tune from New Order. Yes, all you metal-heads out there, this was a discotheque favorite before the Trent Reznor-inspired Orgy made it their own. "Blue Monday" sounds mighty fine whatever style it comes in. "Dissention" and "Gender" are two other tracks from the band.

Limp Bizkit is the best part of this. They have also had a hit with an eighties tune: George Michael's "Faith". They put on a true show and, in the process, make Orgy's songs and Rammstein's delivery of "Du Hast" feel dull. The lead singer of Limp Bizkit shouts the crowd pleaser, "let me hear some noise" and their live version of "Cambodia" with all of its spacey breaks is superb. "Faith" is dedicated to "the women of America" before it gets going. The way the word "faith" is screamed in front of thousands of fans has to be heard to be believed.

Ice Cube is up next with his rap/hip-hop sounds. "Check Yo Self" is brought to life by the unmistakable sound of Grandmaster Flash's "The Message". He also performs "Natural Born Killaz" and "Straight Outta Compton/F* Tha Police" from his N.W.A days.

Rammstein pops up briefly before the glory of Korn. They kick things off with "Shot Liver Medley", a seven-minute epic filled with pieces of six of their songs. They also perform "Freak On A Leash", "Twist/Chi", and their hit song of last year, "Got The Life". Their live sound is impressively tight, the drums have a great hollow sound and the bass playing is fast and heavy.

Small doses of music from each of the bands on the tour makes this worth listening to. For those of you who are more "video" than "audio" there is a companion videotape to this collection. B+

Limp Bizkit adds flavor to Korn's latest compilation on their "Family Values" tour.

Ex-WMUA DJ creates mix tape

POSTPUNK CHRONICLES

Rhino

This glorified mix tape is the brainchild of Jim Neill, senior director of promotion for the Rhino label and former DJ and music director for our very own student-radio station, WMUA, back in the eighties.

Neill's hand-picked collection takes us back to the days when he hosted a radio show called "Terpsichorean Cacophony"— a time he recalls when folks went to the now long-gone "Main Street Records in Northampton to convert [their] paychecks into vinyl."

He adds, "We lived the music on our radio shows, in fanzines and at parties attended by non-athletic, smoking liberal arts majors with silly haircuts." Heavy on British sounds, volume 2, features a few familiar bands (R.E.M. and The Church), some which float dangerously close to oblivion and others dredged from the depths of obscurity.

The booklet offers informative and oftentimes funny anecdotes about life and music during the period as documented by music industry insiders.

The tracks range in time from the June 1979 single release of Wire's "Outdoor Miner" to The Chills' "Pink Frost" single from June 1984. All of the tracks are remarkably strong. It is the kind of compilation you would expect from a man with access to all sorts of record company vaults.

Peter Hook's opening bass lines to New Order's "Ceremony" still work magic. "I'm In Love With A German Film Star" from The Passions is the real find here. It is a gloriously pop song that shamefully has been overlooked for almost twenty years.

The cover art features a spiky-haired guy trying to adjust to the new era. He is inside his car fiddling with the radio. A copy of the British music paper NME is on the passenger seat, R.E.M.'s Reckoning LP is on the floor and an "I love Cocteau Twins" bumper sticker covers up one for "Cheap Trick on the glove box.

Neill's collection is noteworthy in that it refuses to rehash the same tracks from the time like so many other collections. He gives us the rarely heard "Airwaves" from Thomas Dolby rather than "She Blinded Me With Science."

Rhino has produced a new series of music in the vein that we have come to expect from the label following the excellent multi-volume Just Can't Get Enough series chronicling eighties pop. B+

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Denise Brey has been a consistant force all season for the Minutewomen, but will be looked upon to step up during the stretch run.

an increasing number of injuries.

Attack Stephanie Pavlick, a potent offensive threat, went down near the end of the second half of the Brown game with an ankle injury, joining defenders Colleen Wales and Shalee Merkle on the trainer's table, both casualties of the team's early season escapades on the artificial turf of Garber Field. Unfortunately, it doesn't end there.

"[Junior midfielder] Sara MacNabb has tibia stress fractures and so we're going to find out... whether she's playable or not," McClellan said. "Even if she's playable, it slows her down. Pav' going out with the ankle — she'll only be out for a little while, but we've been trying to get her back in the swing of things, so that hurts."

We're going deep into our bench. Our bench kids need to step up. It's been really frustrating."

The Flying Dutchwomen of Hofstra have no sympathy. They will come to Amherst looking to avenge a narrow 9-8 loss in Hempstead, NY, last year. The Dutch will unload both barrells.

"[Hofstra] has a senior attack Heather Kane who is very fast and can turn it on and she's someone we will be looking out for," McClellan said. "Hofstra is always a scrappy team."

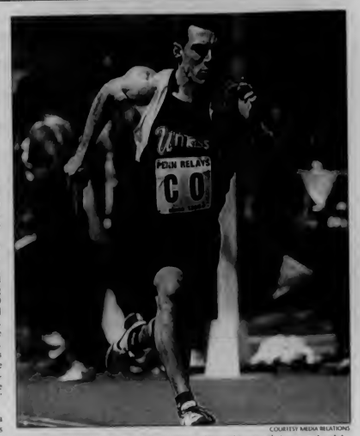
tions report. "We are strong in the sprints and hurdles, we are strong in the throws, we are strong in the jumps, we are strong in the middle and long distances. We don't have major weaknesses. That has been our strength."

These strengths will put the team in a good position as they head to Pennsylvania for the season opener.



The minutemen will look to regain the Atlantic 10 titles that they captured last season.

Stellar performances can be expected among the top relay sprinters. Seniors Tom Toye, Neil Concepcion, and Eugene LaFlamme will look to maintain their positions as defending New England Champions in the 4x100 meter relay and as top finishers in the 4x400 meter relay at the Atlantic 10 Championships.

The team can also look to Ben Baraldi for a repeat of last year's performance in the 110 meter hurdles. Finishing third at the New England Championships last season and taking fourth at the Atlantic 10 Chmpionships, he captured the third best time in the UMass history. Concepcion will also be expected to be a contributor in the 400 meter hurdles.

Another contributor in Saturday's quad-meet will be senior Albie Vasquez who will continue to dominate in the pole vault, after setting the UMass school pole vault record of 14' 11".

The team will head to Pennsylvania and try to improve on last seasons records and regain their Atlantic 10 titles.

Celtic's begin resurgence at midpoint

When did being a Celtics fan get so complicated? Wasn't it just a couple of short months ago that the C's looked like a young, talented squad that no one really expected too much from. They seemed to have the potential to do something interesting. How things change.

If you listen to talk radio or read the Boston Globe on certain days, you'd think that Rick Pitino lost the attention of his team. Some would attribute it to the coach's overbearing style, others to the minuscule attention span of a group of young men with the median maturity level of a skinny thirteen-year-old who just discovered girls.

Regardless of who you listen to, it seems that everyone agrees the Celtics are in trouble. Maybe everyone should calm down. Chill out. Relax. This team is not dead.

What has happened to the Celtics is very simple. Looking at the lockout shortened schedule, it was easy to see at the beginning of the season that March would make or break this team. A month with a few home games, a on of road games, and young, inexperienced team — it was make or break, and they broke. It happens.

What the Celtics had was a losing streak, make that a bad losing streak, in the midst of a season in which teams can't afford to lose for long. They had no time to practice, no time to rest, and no time to get away from each other or their high strung coach; all they did was play. And they lost. The losing gathered momentum, and suddenly the C's were looking at headlines that said things like "Celtics Drop Tenth in Eleven Games."

Paul Pierce cried after a tough loss, some say after being verbally abused by Pitino. Antoine Walker got booed mercilessly at the Fleet Center, at times probably deserving it. Kenny Anderson, supposedly the greatest passer in New York playground history, looked for his shot rather than the black hole that was Walker on his more obnoxious nights. We heard reports that Pitino was shopping Tony Battie and Bruce Bowen (two of the truly energetic guys on the team) to the Clippers for a washed-up Rodney Rogers. These were bad things.

Is this team done? Will the big three—Walker, Mercer, and Pierce—be together next season? Is Pitino a snake-oil salesman and a fraud, as talk radio would have us believe? It is a complicated situation to be sure. The fragile egos of Walker and Anderson, even of the coach himself, have been pushed hard in this grueling season. The team has at times stunk, but road wins in Philly and Charlotte this past week show that the they have not folded up.

In fact, the Celtics have fifteen home games in April. Will they make the playoffs? Of course not, but the one thing they don't need is another young player, so tanking the season with the idea of getting a high lottery pick would be silly. The Celtics, very easily, could win ten of those home games, carry that confidence on the road for a win or two, and end the season feeling pretty good about themselves. Pitino, Mister Motivational Tape himself, is capable of turning the smallest silver lining into a thundercloud of positivity of biblical proportions. Getting within five games of .500 would do wonders.

One thing Celtics fans, and perhaps Pitino himself, need to realize is that it is going to be very difficult to upgrade this team through trades, the draft, or free agency. Believe it or not, the talent is already here. If they could score a big man in the second round (did someone say Lari Ketner, who said Lari Ketner?) or another press man (why Wayne Turner, of course) they could improve a little bit, but make no mistakes, the Celtics future lies on the shoulders of the aforementioned big three.

There are really two things that could happen. One is that the Celtics continue their recent (other adjectives would be brief, unexpected, or momentary) road success of the last week, cruise home, win some games, make happy with each other, become a family, and get ready to fulfill Pitino's promise of a playoff birth in year number three.

The other scenario, of course, is pretty unattractive. The Celtics lose at home, the boos rain down, Pitino starts naming names (see Kenny Anderson) of players he doesn't like coaching, Antoine shoots every time he touches it, Pierce stands around waving for the ball, and Pitino, finally sick of it all, makes a really bad trade that makes very little sense (see Eric Williams, spring 1997).

It really is hard to tell. The immature mind of the modern ball player makes these guys incredibly hard to read. The shortened season exacerbates this problem. The high-stung coach further obscures things. Trying to make a declarative statement about this team is like trying to decipher how many times Bill Walton will lovingly reference John Wooden or Larry Bird during a game—it can't be done.

So Celtics fans will sit and wait. We will not panic. On the other hand, we will no longer take Pitino's assurances as the gospel truth. Boston fans are, you might say, a little skeptical, but they have given the Italian New Yorker the most leeway afforded to a coach since the Tuna went green. The honeymoon is over. The season is not. This is, after all, not the Red Sox. This is the Celtics. Once a decade they win it all. So maybe we skip one. We've got a whole millennium to make it up.

onslaught, collecting another three RBI and two hits in one of her finest collegiate performances. The first-year player finished with six of her team's 15 RBI between both games. First baseman Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler also added two RBI on a monster home run over the left-center field fence in the bottom of the first inning.

The offensive production came much to the enjoyment of Sortino, who was happy that her predominantly underclassmen batting order was able to take a great deal of pressure off her pitchers.

"It's nice [to score a lot of runs early in the game], because that creates a much better arenas for the pitchers," Sortino said. "It's very difficult on our pitchers when we're not hitting the ball. It's a great thing to get an early lead. You breathe a lot easier."

After jumping out to a 5-0 advantage by the end of the first inning in game two, the Minutewomen quickly responded with another three runs in the second frame after a Rooney home run blast. UMass tacked on another run in the third inning before ending the game with a final tally in the bottom of the fifth. The mercy rule, which was used yesterday, ends a contest prematurely if a team holds a lead of eight runs or greater after five innings of play.

The Minutewomen, winners of 14 of their last 16 games, will now head to Philadelphia this weekend for two Atlantic 10 doublers headers. On Saturday, they will visit Temple, will face host St. Joseph's on Easter Sunday.

"We're coming into a big weekend with Temple and St. Joe's. That's a huge conference weekend for us. It's tough to win in Philly... I feel a lot better than I did yesterday before we played these games. It's good for our kids' confidence to know that they can hit the ball like that."

Henderson fans 18 in no-hitter; UMass takes two from Vermont

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

It was April Fools Day and the Massachusetts softball pitching–ace pulled off quite the trick.

University of Vermont third baseman Anna Curry had looked a bit perplexed as she walked from the batter's box back into the dugout yesterday at Totman Field.

After striking out swinging for the second time in the game during the fifth inning, Curry shrugged her shoulders and tried to explain what is was like facing UMass star pitcher Danielle Henderson.

"It looked like I was going to hit it when I swung," she said aloud to no one in particular.

And that just about summed up the afternoon for the Catamounts, who watched a Minutewoman pitching clinic in game one of the double–header. Before the end of the contest, Henderson had fooled many batters who were just as puzzled as Curry. The UMass senior strikeout queen finished game one tying a career–high 18 strikeouts en route to her tenth career no–hitter and a 7–0 Minutewomen romp.

In the second contest, sophomore Carrie Ieffries followed Henderson with a sour prank of her own, blanking Vermont 8–0 through five innings before the umpires invoked the mercy rule.

But the strangest aspect of the back–to–back shutouts was no so much the shutouts themselves, but rather the fact that both pitchers could blank the opponent and not even be at their best.

This was especially the case for Henderson, who is such an intimidating force that the Catamount (8–8) batters were distraught before they even attempted to hit her unhittable pitches.

"I don't know if I was doing anything that well, [but] they were swinging at a lot of my pitchers, and I just kept with that," Henderson said. "There was nothing that was working great. If they kept swinging at a pitch, I kept throwing it there."

UMass (17–7) coach Elaine Sortino also believed that frustration can become the enemy of a batter facing Henderson, especially when the batter has been unsuccessful in previous trips to the plate.

"I think maybe the second or third time around in the order, there's a frustration that sets in because they're trying to see the ball and they're swinging and missing," Sortino said.

Henderson, the modest Commack, N.Y. native, almost hurled a perfect game, if not for her own errant throw to first base in the opening frame. Although Sortino admits that Vermont may have been somewhat uneasy around Henderson, she also feels that jitters of a home–opening game rattled the Minutewomen a bit.

"She wasn't that good today, they were swinging at bad pitches," Sortino said. "We dodged bullets and she knows that, she's a smart enough and mature enough pitcher to know that. I know I sound crazy, she struck out 18 and threw a no–hitter, but I know what she needs to do, and we got away with some pitches that [they shouldn't have] swung at... I think that error in the first inning was clearly evident of where we were."

Although Sortino admitted that, like Henderson, Ieffries has pitched better at times, she was extremely pleased with the effort from her second starter, who was able to shut down the Catamounts three times after allowing a batter to reach base early in the inning.

"Carrie stuttered a little bit here and there, but she threw well, and when she got runners on base, she clamped down, and shut them down, that's what really counts," Sortino said.

In addition to the solid pitching performance, UMass exploded for 15 total runs offensively. In the opening game, freshman Terry Rooney helped the Minutewomen jump out to an early advantage and finished with a team–high three RBI. Senior left fielder Becky George also tied Rooney for a team–best two hits against Vermont ace Cheri Toms, who yielded seven runs off only eight hits. Catcher Nikki Faessler and second baseman Mandy Gulas each added an RBI for UMass.

The hot bats continued to produce for the Minutewomen in the second contest, Rooney again led the UMass

Duquesne next
UMass play Dukes for 3

By Michael Kobylanski

The University of Massachusetts baseball team will look to take its first steps towards the Atlantic 10 tournament this weekend when it travels to Pittsburgh for a three–game series with Duquesne. The set opens the Atlantic 10 portion of the schedule for the Minutemen.

Because of the Easter Holiday on Sunday, the two teams play a doubleheader today against the Dukes before playing one game tomorrow. Typically, the A–10 format has teams playing a double–dip on Saturday and a single game on Sunday.

UMass (9–8) is coming off a 13–0 trashing of the of Hartford on Wednesday afternoon at Earl Lorden Field. The Minutemen pounded out 19 hits against four different Hawks pitchers in the victory.

"This is a big series. Our road to the Atlantic 10 and NCAA tournaments begins here," UMass baseball coach Mike Stone said. "We've got to play well."

Duquesne brings a 7–12 record into the weekend. Traditionally, the Dukes are a team at the bottom of the pack in the A–10 Western Division, but the Minutemen know they need to carry the momentum they picked up from Wednesday's win into this weekend.

"Our A–10 schedule starts this weekend, and we've got to start playing well," said UMass sophomore hurler Nick Skirkanich, who tossed a three–hit shutout against UHA on Wednesday. "Our defense has been making the plays, and our offense always seems to be there."

For the Minutemen, offensive production has not really been a problem this season. UMass has scored five or more runs in 15 of 19 games thus far this season.

The hottest UMass hitter of late is freshman outfielder Mike Kulak. The Bristol, Conn. native has hit home runs in three of the last four games, and he's boasting an impressive 10–for–17 streak during that span.

Other top threats for the Minutemen are seniors Bryan Mazzferro, Aaron Braunstein and freshman Chris Morgan. Redshirt freshman Scott Anderson has also been solid so far, hitting .380 this year.

This weekend's pitching rotation features junior Travis Veracka in game one on Friday and sophomore Craig Szado getting the ball in game two. Veracka pitched five strong innings against Yale last weekend, but did not figure in the decision. The starter for Saturday's game will be senior co–captain Bill Cooke, who is looking to get back on track after several shaky outings.

"We've got Travis, Craig and Bill going, with (David) Loonie, (Jesse) Santos ready to shut them (Duquesne) down in relief," Stone said. "If we play like we did today (against Hartford) and those guys give us quality innings, then we should be fine."

After the Minutemen conclude the series with the Dukes, UMass will return home Wednesday to open up a 10–game homestand against Central Connecticut State University. The Maroon and White annihilated the Blue Devils 17–0 back on March 20.

But before the Minutemen start to look ahead, they know they need to remain focused on sweeping the Dukes.

"This is what you play the season for, to get to the A–10's and be the regular season champs," Stone said. "We are going to need to make sure that we pick up our level of play and our level of concentration (against Duquesne)."

Season starts
UMass track opens at Penn

By Melissa Sherman

Beginning the Massachusetts outdoor track season with an impressive start, members of the team traveled to Gainsville Florida to partake in the 55th Coca Cola Florida Relays at the University of Florida on Saturday, March 27th.

Shattering the recent school record in the javelin throw was junior record breaker Vic Morency. Morency took first place with a distance of 224' 2," surpassing the old record by 7'.

Another top performer of the Florida Relays was senior B.J. Cardoza who placed sixth in the hammer throw with a mark of 197' 7" breaking the old school record of 193' 7".

Both Morency and Cardoza begin with outstanding record breaking performances that qualify them for the New England Championships as well as the IC4A and NCAA Championships.

This Saturday marks the beginning of the season for the rest of the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team.

They travel to the University of Pennsylvania this weekend to begin their season with a quad–meet against Penn, Cornell, Manhattan and Viginia Tech. The team will look to take advantage of its team depth as it attempts to place in the Atlantic 10 Championships.

"One of the overall strengths of our team for several years now is that we have been able to present a balanced attack, scoring some points in every major event group," said coach Ken O'Brien, in a pre–season media rela-

UM men's lax set to face No. 19 Butler

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has reached the proverbial fork in the road and must now choose which path to follow.

One road leads to glory, and post–season prosperity, the other to an undeniable force of destruction.

The 3–3 laxmen will have their first opportunity to decide their fate tomorrow when they host Butler (3–4) at Garber Field, with WMUA, 91.1 taking the call at 1:45 p.m.

Tomorrow's match will present the up–and–down Minutemen with another chance for their first win over a ranked opponent, as Butler entered the week at No.19.

Thus far, UMass has failed to get quality wins in their previous three tries against No. 4 Virginia, previous No.19 Hofstra and No. 20 Cornell.

Another loss of this nature could seriously increase the likelihood that UMass will miss the post–season for the second consecutive season.

Unlike last year when UMass bolted out of the gate to a 6– 0 start before crumbling, the squad will not have early– season laurels to even contemplate falling back on.

One of the keys to pulling out a victory against Butler will be to control face–offs a problem that has plagued UMass.

The Maroon and White have won only 63–of–133 face–off attempts this season, allowing opponents to control the tempo and set up their offense accordingly.

Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella is still awaiting the return of junior Jeff Seals who was his initial choice to take the bulk of the draws.

In the meantime, Cannella will continue to combine David Kramer and Marc Morley in the majority of the mid– field meetings.

"We used different combinations throughout the first eight faceoffs versus BC on Tuesday," Cannella said. "I think that strategy was effective."

The contest against the Bulldogs will be the first time UMass has faced them adding extra intrigue to the match–up.

Butler is in a similar predicament to UMass at this point, having fallen to all of their ranked opponents as well.

Most recently they dropped a squeaker to No. 8 Delaware 15–13, despite a four goal, one assist effort attack by Chris Vosburgh.

Vosburgh is currently tied for first on the team in scoring, with 10 goals, 13 assists.

Midfielder Cory Kahoun has also posted 23 points, with 19 goals and four assists to his credit.

The Bulldogs have utilized four goalkeepers in their initial seven games, with Marc Ferrandino and Brel McCoy filling the majority of the time between the pipes.

Ferrandino has allowed 37 goals, and saved 39 shots, while McCoy has allowed 34 scores, while stopping 34 in the process.

"We need to play better lacrosse to become a better team," Cannella said. "We need a solid sixty minute effort [tomorrow] and then we will from there."

UM goes Dutch; Hofstra to visit

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

On the heels of their second road loss against a ranked opponent in as many games, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will host unranked Hofstra today at 3:30 p.m.

After coming up far short of No. 19 Syracuse in the Carrier Dome last Saturday, losing 11–2, the Minutewomen (3–3) narrowly lost at No. 20 Brown on Wednesday, 12–11 in overtime.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Rebecca Minaker is expected to emerge as one of the leaders for the Minutewomen as they face Hofstra today.

Today, they will face America East conference participant, Hofstra (1–4), in the season's first game at Judd J. Totman Field, In Amherst. UMass is 3–0 while playing at Richard F. Garber Field. The Minutewomen have been successful against the America East as well, hammering Vermont 16–2 on March 24.

These trends can't lull the struggling Massachusetts squad into a false sense of security.

"I'm glad we're home tomorrow," UMass Coach Francesca McClellan said. "it's a nice mental recovery as far as our record is concerned: it gives us a bit of a boost.

"We've only been on our game field for two days, so how familiar is it? Only partially."

Today's matchup should go a long way towards determining who will step up and lead a seemingly lost team. Senior co–captain Melissa Anderson has shown both offensive and defensive prowess, leading the team in scoring with 11 goals and an assist while among the team–leaders in ground–balls as well, however, she has not dominated the competition outside of occasional barrages. Junior Noelle Gorski has eight goals and two assists on the year as well, and is possibility to guide the squad during the current troubles.

McClellan points to midfielders Rachel Ingraffea and Rebecca Minaker and attack Fay Naber when asked to mention players who stepped up against Brown. Still, the coach has areas to work on.

"We really struggled defensively, and we had the whole defensive team in here today looking at film. They're pretty clear at what needs to be done," McClellan said.

McClellan has more to worry about than finding a field general for her troops — she must also deal with

Women's outdoor track set for quad–meet at Dartmouth

By Michael P. Doyle
Collegian Correspondent

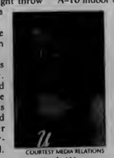
The Masssachusetts women's outdoor track team heads to Hanover, NH this weekend to compete against New England foes at Dartmouth College on April 3.

The Minutewomen compete as a full squad for the first time this season, since only two competitors were sent to Gainsville, Fla. last week to the 55th Coca Cola Florida Relays at the University of Florida.

Massachusetts will face host Dartmouth, New Hampshire, Vermont and the Blackbears of Maine. Coach Julie LaFreniere is excited about the number of teams competing.

"We're looking for a few teams that provide good competition across the board," LaFreniere said.

"Multiple teams [rather than a dual meet] guarantees virtually everyone will have good competitors."



LaFreniere seems confident her Massachusetts team has the ability to measure up to the competition this season, especially with the addition of the throwing events that indoor track does not include.

LaFreniere will look to sophomore Shannon Hamilton and junior Giselle Nicholas for large contributions in the throwing events in the absence of last year's Atlantic 10 weight throw champion Shana Mitchell.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Nicole Way

"The Minutewomen look ready.

"The team is fairly healthy. We're excited about having the throwing events which should add to a better overall performance," she said.

The excitement is also about junior Andrea Comeau and senior Nicole Way. The two raised eyebrows last week by placing well in the heptatholon at the Coca Cola Florida Relays. High expectations are set for these two teammates, who both possess impressive resumes.

Comeau is the school's record holder in both the high jump and heptatholon. Her heptatholon performance of 4,704 at the season opening meet in Gainsville, Florida, qualified the junior for the ECACs. She is also coming off the indoor season in which she qualified for the NCAAs In the high jump.

Her teammate, Way, was the Atlantic 10's best performer at the A–10 indoor championships this past season. Coach LaFreniere has high expectations on both upper–classmen.

Massachusetts is facing a number of schools this weekend that bring a versatile group of competitors to the table. Coach LaFreniere believes UMass puts strong competitors in every event.

Dartmouth will challenge Massachusetts in the throwing events with their strength in the discus, javelin and hammer. Their distance running is also strong.

Vermont and New Hampshire both bring a solid corp of sprinters and throwers, with Vermont adding strength at middle–distance events.

Maine provides no depth on their outdoor squad but the Blackbears have good individuals at every event.

Group writes Scott on policy changes

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Citizens in Amherst are now joining students at the University of Massachusetts and four colleges in condemning recent change in the admissions policy.

In an open letter to Chancellor David K. Scott, Amherst citizens from Not In Our Town (NIOT), an anti–racist watchdog group for the town, asked Scott to return to the former admissions policy which made race a more significant factor in the admissions process.

"We understand both the pressure upon you and the complexity of the issues, however, we are convinced that now more than ever, people of good conscience must take a courageous stand against the forces that would move us backward," said the letter signed by the NIOT steering committee.

Scott said in a recent interview that he welcomes input from groups outside the University.

"I think it's good that the community is becoming involved in it," Scott said. "The Town of Amherst, I think, is very concerned and interested in diversity but it has its problems too. So I think if the whole community can get involved so much the better."

He also said he would be willing to meet with any group that wants to discuss the admissions policy change.

But as far as what the impact the letter may have on Scott, Arlene Avakian, a member of the NIOT steering committee, said she could not speculate.

"After the last month I can't fathom what is in the chancellor's head," Avakian said.

The group felt particularly compelled to address the issue, Avakian said, because it was right in their own backyards.

We're "being responsible citizens. We're in Amherst so were closer to this than other parts of the state," Avakian said. "This is not just a limited isolated incident at UMass."

Avakian said she was glad to see students also protesting the change in the policy.

"Its very heartening to see the students really taking up this issue," she said.

Scott addresses admissions today

By Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

In his first attempt at addressing the University of Massachusetts campus community on the recent revisions to the admissions policy, Chancellor David K. Scott is holding a public forum today.

The chancellor will be holding a small press conference earlier in the morning. The public forum will be from 3:45– 5:54 p.m. in Bartlett room 65.

The chancellor's hopes for the forum are to clear up and explain some of the misinformation he has cited, as well as receive feedback from the community.

While the chancellor discusses plans for establishing task forces to address new issues raised by the admissions policy, dissenting students, part of the Task Force for Equal Opportunity and Access for All People, are continuing their efforts to fight the revisions which made race less of a priority in admissions.

The Task Force requested a meeting with the chancellor, Board of Trustees, and President William Bulger two weeks ago when they submitted a letter requesting a moratorium on the admissions policy.

In an Interview, Scott said there were no specific names to respond to so he contacted the Student Government Association (SGA) who said they were too busy at the time to meet due to elections.

A meeting was setup by the SGA for members of the Task Force to meet with two members of the Board of Trustees in which the chancellor was present, although he said there have not been any meetings setup with him specifically.

"I'll meet with students whenever they want, not to negotiate or to agree to demands but certainly to try and understand the issues and shape my thinking," Scott said.

The chancellor's new plan says a student body that reflects the diversity of the commonwealth is a long–range plan which he expects to take at least a couple of years to work.

Scott's plan involves a "systemic outreach program" which will work with students in middle and high school to better prepare them for college. However, students from the Task Force feel this is too long and do not trust the chancellor's plan.

In response to his criticism, the chancellor said — "The plan is an interim plan, I can't insist on trust, all I can say is give me some time to try and work on a new plan because I did work very energetically on the plan we had."

In addition to the "systemic outreach program," Scott plans to focus more on retention of Asian, Latino, African and Native American (ALANA) students as well with short– and medium–range missiles that can take out Yugoslav air defenses throughout Kosovo, where ethnic Albanians are under continued attack. Some 14 Bradley Fighting Vehicles, military police and intelligence officers are included.

Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said deploying the Apaches and rocket launchers was "a logical expansion" of the nearly two–week–old NATO airstrikes to halt Yugoslav Slobodan Milosevic's military drive against Kosovars in the Serbian province.

NATO leaders meeting today must approve using the weapons, followed by President Clinton.

The Pentagon said it could take up to 10 days to deploy the Apaches from their base at Illesheim, Germany, because many U.S. military cargo planes also are being used for humanitarian aide.

"It's to give us the type of tank–killing capability that the bad weather has denied us," Bacon said. "It will give us the capability to get up closer and personal to the Milosevic armor of units in Kosovo, and to do a more

College tuition goes up
Student enrollment goes down

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

While University of Massachusetts students have seen their tuition decrease over the past four years, New England colleges as a whole have raised their prices while their share of students and research has decreased.

According to a report published by the New England Board of Higher Education (NEBHE)'s newsletter Connection, the average cost of tuition and mandatory fees at a four–year New England public institution is $4,635, compared to a national average of $3,243. The average private New England college costs $19,211, significantly higher than the national average of $14,508.

These high costs may be driving away students. The same report states that New England's total college enrollment has undergone a substantial decline In recent years, from 827,000 students in 1992, to 795,000 in 1996. This decline, says NEBHE, is as if New England lost the entire student bodies of Amherst College, Mount Holyoke College, the University of Massachusetts at Dartmouth, Brown University, Tufts University, Babson College, Bates College, and Holy Cross in four years.

But John Harney, the Executive Director of Connection, doesn't find these figures particularly distressing.

"It's mostly explained by the demographics," he said. "There are fewer students of traditional college age in New England than there used to be." Harvey also pointed out that the number of 18–year–olds in New England has rebounded since their study was conducted.

Despite the decline in students, enrollment of minorities at New England schools has increased, according to the study. African–American enrollment at New England schools grew 24 percent between 1990 and 1996, while Hispanic enrollment increased by 46 percent and Native American enrollment increased by 45 percent. African–American, Hispanic and Native American students only represent nine percent of New England college students. But the percentage

19th century diary found chronicles woman's life

By Frank Magiera
The Telegram & Gazette

WORCESTER, Mass. (AP) - She knew the transcendentalists, the abolitionists and the leaders of the 19th–century women's rights movement. She survived the panic of 1837, the Civil War and half a lifetime of economic struggle.

And Caroline Healey Dall wrote all about it in books, magazine essays and newspaper articles. Most important of all, for most of her 90 years Dall also wrote about it in a meticulous and very personal daily journal. The diary may be the most exhaustive firsthand account of an American woman's life in the 19th century, but it still has gone largely unnoticed.

Helen R. Deese is the scholar who finally noticed.

For the last 10 years, Deese has immersed herself in Dall's journal and expects to spend another six years editing it before selected portions can be published.

For the last year, Deese has been conducting her research at the American Antiquarian Society, where she is a Mellon postdoctoral fellow.

"I don't think this is just another woman's journal," said Deese, who retired recently as professor of English at Tennessee Technological University. "I think this is something truly extraordinary."

One reason, she said, is the scope and detail of the journals. "You go through the whole last two–thirds of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century. All the major events, she said. "You're right there. You're part of it. Changes in transportation and medicine and all of that."

Another reason is all the important people associated with Dall. She shared ideas with Ralph Waldo Emerson, Margaret Fuller and the other transcendentalists. She was close to the abolitionists, including many of the movement's leaders In Worcester. She was also at the forefront of the women's rights movement, along with Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cody Stanton.

"The fact that she is associated with, and involved in, these major reform movements is a good reason why these journals are important."

They're also important for what Dall left out. Or rather, for what she tried to leave out.

Deese discovered that before Dall turned over her journals to the Massachusetts Historical Society, she cut out pages and crossed out passages. While the excised pages may

Clinton's aid wanted for eliminating police brutality

By Shannon McCaffrey
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Protesters against police brutality turned their attention from New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani to President Clinton on Saturday as some 2,500 demonstrators marched in Washington calling for the president and Congress to help combat police abuses.

Demonstrators gathered outside the Martin Luther King Jr. Library and walked about one mile to the steps of the Capitol chanting "no justice no peace, no more racist police" and "let's stop the Klan in blue."

Although the rally was intended to call for changes to abusive police practices nationwide it was spurred by the shooting of Amadou Diallo, which has riveted national attention on the troubled New York City Police Department. Buttons, T–shirts, fliers and posters with Diallo's picture or name were everywhere in the sea of demonstrators.

The crowd frequently erupted into simple cries of "Amadou."

Four New York City police officers were arraigned on second–degree murder charges in Diallo's death last week.

The officers fired 41 shots at the unarmed West African immigrant, hitting him 19 times.

The shooting set off a wave of protests in New York City at which some 1,200 people were arrested on civil disobedience charges for blocking access to police headquarters.

A spokeswoman for the Manhattan District Attorney's Office said Saturday those protesters would likely not be prosecuted.

The organizer of those protests, the Rev. Al Sharpton, received a rousing welcome at the sun–drenched Washington rally as he arrived in the late afternoon with members of the Diallo family.

Bellowing from the Capitol steps, Sharpton announced a national tour against police brutality and called for a national day of civil disobedience outside police headquarters where abuses had been documented.

Sharpton also said Clinton's March 12 radio address, in which the president talked about police integrity, was not enough.

And he spoke of widespread black support for the president during the Monica Lewinsky scandal.

"Don't you turn deaf ears Mr. President. You're there 'cause we stood for you. Now it's time that you stood for us," Sharpton said.

"You can't preach morality in Yugoslavia and allow police to kill in New York City."

Sharpton said he wants the president to meet with the families of people killed by police and called on Clinton to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate police brutality.

The rally came as the highest ranking member of New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani's administration told the mayor he had been harassed by the police for what he believed were racial reasons, according to the New York Times.

Deputy Mayor Rudy Washington told Giuliani he had been bullied and intimidated by police on more than one occasion, the Times reported.

2,000 troops off to Albania in escalation

By Laura Myers
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In a risk–laden escalation of the American military commitment, the United States has agreed to send 24 Apache helicopter gunships and 2,000 troops to Albania, giving NATO the ability to directly attack Serb troops and tanks in Yugoslavia, the Clinton administration said yesterday.

To protect the Apaches, U.S. troops will man 18 Multiple Launch Rocket Systems deployed to Albania as well with short– and medium–range missiles that can take out Yugoslav air defenses throughout Kosovo, where ethnic Albanians are under continued attack. Some 14 Bradley Fighting Vehicles, military police and intelligence officers are included.

Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said deploying the Apaches and rocket launchers was "a logical expansion" of the nearly two–week–old NATO airstrikes to halt Yugoslav Slobodan Milosevic's military drive against Kosovars in the Serbian province.

NATO leaders meeting today must approve using the weapons, followed by President Clinton.

The Pentagon said it could take up to 10 days to deploy the Apaches from their base at Illesheim, Germany, because many U.S. military cargo planes also are being used for humanitarian aide.

"It's to give us the type of tank–killing capability that the bad weather has denied us," Bacon said. "It will give us the capability to get up closer and personal to the Milosevic armor of units in Kosovo, and to do a more

Pope calls for Kosovo Peace

By Frances D'Emilio
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Striking a note of sorrow on Christianity's most joyous day, Pope John Paul II implored Yugoslav authorities yesterday to open a "humanitarian corridor" so aid can reach Kosovo's desperate refugees.

"On this holy day I feel duty–bound to make a heartfelt appeal to the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to allow a humanitarian corridor to be opened in order for help to be brought to the mass of people gathered at the border of Kosovo," the pope said in his Easter address.

In an extemporaneous addition to his written text, John Paul added: "There are always numerous corridors of hope!"

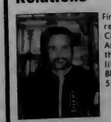
Vatican envoys have been working for both an end to the NATO bombings and a return of Yugoslav leaders and ethnic Albanians to the negotiating table.

For the pope, Easter was tinged with sorrow over the war. He expressed dismay over both Yugoslavia's violence against ethnic Albanians and the NATO airstrikes aimed at trying to induce Yugoslavia back to the peace table.

"How can we speak of peace when people are forced to flee, when they are hunted down, and their homes are burnt to the ground?" the pope asked during his Easter message after late–morning Mass in St. Peter's Square attended by tens of thousands of faithful and broadcast worldwide.

"When the heavens are rent by the din of war, when the whistle of shells is heard around people's homes and the ravaging fire of bombs consumes towns and villages?" the pope added.

"Enough of this cruel shedding of human blood! When will there be an end to the diabolical spiral of revenge and senseless fratricidal conflict?"



"I invoke the precious gift of peace above all for the devastated land of Kosovo, where tears and blood continue to mingle in a tragic spectacle of hate and violence," the pope said, his voice rising.

after receiving advice from legal counselors and UMass President William Bulger that the admissions policy was not working.

The chancellor has already stated that he will not reverse his decision and go back to a moratorium on the admissions policy and instead wants to work with the 1978 Bakke Supreme Court case ruling.

"The Bakke ruling determined that race may be used as a factor in University admissions policy, as long as it is one of many factors.

Many opponents of the chancellor's decision feel he should challenge the Supreme Court ruling which he said he will not do. Instead, Scott plans on working within the legal parameters to carry out his new approach to achieving diversity.

A number of other characteristics Scott said he plans to look at in admissions are an individual's "ability to communicate with the poor and the ability to show compassion for other human beings... we continue to use race just not as 'boldly' as before."

The chancellor would also like to focus on working with those from low-income families, which he said includes a large amount of ALANA students.

Scott further clarified his position saying — "...it's not that we're abandoning the use of race, it's that the courts have reinterpreted or re-clarified what the Supreme Court said on that subject and we're trying to come more in line with that."

Through all of the proceedings so far surrounding the admissions policy, Scott feels one good thing to come about is that the University as a whole has become engaged in a discussion of the admissions policy.

In response to the possibility of students taking over a building as took place in a similar situation with the 1997 Goodell takeover, Scott said the picketing code would be enforced with the possibility of arrests and University suspension.

"I don't believe that this is an issue that justifies people taking over buildings and causing disruption... we encourage and work with dissent but we will not tolerate disruption of the business and the activities of the University."

is far lower than the percentage of minorities ages 18-24 in the New England population.

Connection also points out that New England schools, in addition to losing students, are undergoing a decline in their share of scientific research. In 1983, New England schools' share of expenditures by U.S. universities was 10.1 percent. In 1997, New England schools account for only 8.3 percent.

"In a lot of ways, it's not that New England is doing something to lose its research," Harney said. But newer universities in other areas of the country are simply "catching up."

But not all the numbers point to a decline. According to the NEBHE, New England schools still contain a disproportionately high number of college students. New England is home to approximately five percent of the country, yet it contains eight percent of college students.

New England also attracts more students from outside its borders than any other region of the country. Twenty-five percent of freshmen at New England colleges and universities are from other areas of the country, a five percent increase from 1992.

be lost forever. Deese has managed to salvage the writing beneath some of the crossed-out sections. Those sections that could not be visually deciphered are being analyzed and digitized by computer in the hope that the writing can be uncovered.

Deese believes many of the crossed-out sections involve Dall's relationships with men - she's careful not to characterize them as lovers or even boyfriends.

"People, who are her emotional focus, is about the best I can do with it," Deese said. "And she's always got to have one. Throughout her life there's always one, with just small intermissions."

Dall was unhappily married to a Unitarian minister who spent much of their marriage away from home as a missionary in India. For emotional support, she apparently turned to about half a dozen other men, some of whom were boarders in her house, others who corresponded with her over long distances. Almost all of them were considerably younger than she was. Even though Dall was liberated, independent and somewhat unconventional, Deese does not believe any of them were her lovers.

"If you put a gun to my head and asked, 'Does this turn into anything physical between them?' I would say no, I think there was something else deeper in her. There was some value system." Dall was born in Boston in 1822. Her father was a prosperous merchant who lost his fortune in the 1837 panic, only to regain it a decade later. She was the oldest of eight siblings, and her father encouraged her intellectual pursuits.

"Probably more than anyone else, he's responsible for her being different," Deese said. "He treated her like a boy.

"Her mother was not an intellectual or a reformer at all and didn't really approve of her intellectual activities. Her father apparently took a tremendous interest in her and used to debate questions of philosophy, religion and politics with her when she was very small."

Early on, Dall fell under the influence of Boston's liberal, Unitarian, West Church and the transcendental culture. She began attending Emerson's lectures at the age of 12. She began keeping her journals shortly afterward. Later, she became acquainted with Elizabeth Palmer Peabody, a transcendentalist who also owned a bookstore in Boston.

"This was a big thing, because here was woman who was a model," Deese said. "Through Peabody she became acquainted with Fuller, and she attended Fuller's conversations. That whole intellectual circle, I think, set her life's course toward reform and idealism."

Dall's course toward romance apparently began in Worcester. She was friends with many prominent Worcesterites - the Earles, Goddards, Chases, Lebarons, Firths, Browns, Blakes and, later, Sen. George Frisbie Hoar. When she was about 20, she met Samuel Foster Haven, the librarian of the American Antiquarian Society.

"He gave her the tour of the Antiquarian Society," Deese said. "He was 35 and a widower. They started corresponding and seeing each other. It was very clear from her journal that she's really struck by him. He seems to be interested, too. This goes on for several months, but nothing ever comes of it."

That was because shortly after the relationship began, Dall's father went bankrupt and she took a job as the assistant principal of an exclusive girls' school in Washington, D.C. There she met a Unitarian minister, Charles Henry Appleton Dall, and decided to marry him — on the rebound, Deese believes.

"She didn't know him well at all. It turns out, in hindsight, the marriage was a mistake."

effective job at eliminating or neutralizing the forces on the ground."

He acknowledged the increasing risk to U.S. forces.

"Obviously, close-in engagement is by definition riskier than more distant engagement. But the army is trained to cope with that," he said.

Amid the growing refugee crisis in the Balkans, the United States also said it temporarily will provide shelter for up to 20,000 ethnic Albanians fleeing Serb assaults while European nations take in as many as 100,000 — but just until they can return home under international protection.

"These people have to go back, otherwise there are no people in Kosovo," Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said.

In opening its doors to the victims of Milosevic's effort to clear Kosovo of its ethnic Albanian majority, U.S. officials did not say where refugees might go, but suggested it would be outside the 50 states.

But Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., said on CNN he was told the plan is to airlift them to Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba, once used to house thousands of Haitians fleeing violence in their homeland. Bacon said no decision has been made and that there are appropriate U.S. facilities in Guam as well.

More than 350,000 ethnic Albanians have fled since NATO airstrikes began on March 24, and the exodus continued Yesterday. Albright, appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," blamed the refugee crisis on Milosevic, whose forces have continued attacks on ethnic Albanians and forced them by bus and on foot out of Kosovo, a province of Serbia.

This week the University of Massachusetts Facilities Planning will be shutting down the walkway adjacent to the west side of Old Chapel.

Students will be re-directed around the fence by Goodell in a similar pattern as last fall.

Bruce Thomas, landscape architect with Facilities Planning, feels it will be an inconvenience for students, but says the work has needed to be done.

"We just wanted to let students know it'll only be closed for a few days," Thomas said. "We've been trying to apprise students when this happens so they know in advance."

Thomas will be helping in the installation of drain basins and manholes in the ground by the chapel to catch rainwater runoff from the roof. However in order to do so, the ground will have to be dug up, causing a disruption in student commuting.

Thomas said he hopes all work on the chapel will be done by the end of this summer.

TAX ADVANTAGED SOLUTIONS FROM TIAA CREF

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can avoid with SRAs—tax-deferred annuities from TIAA-CREF. SRAs not only ease your current tax bite, they offer an easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in pretax dollars, you pay less in taxes now. And since earnings on your SRAs are tax deferred, your money works even harder for you.

Today, we offer other before- and after-tax financial solutions, including IRAs and mutual funds. They're backed by the same investment expertise, low expenses, and personal service that have made TIAA-CREF the choice of America's educational and research community.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Stop by your benefits office or call us at 1 800 842-2776 and find out how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy happier returns.

The Affirmative Action Wall

Rene Gonzales

I was privileged enough to attend a closed meeting of about 30 concerned student representatives, faculty and administrators on Thursday, March 25 on the current change in admissions practices. Among the administrators attending were Chancellor Scott, Bob Karam and members of the Board of Trustees. I can't say that I left the meeting calm and optimistic because I was passionate in my speeches and unsatisfied with the outcome. Although another session has been established to take place sometime this month, I felt that a stronger action should have been taken.

Issues brought up in this meeting ranged from problems with the new admissions policy to legal issues. As I have stated before, class-based affirmative action has its fallacies, and for the record, there is no legally binding statute that requires the University to change their practices. They have moved to change their policy because they believe a lawsuit might come to the University. What's to say that minorities will not also sue because of the new policy?

But the meeting's most important issue was the one of trust, or more specifically the lack of it. While I was moved to trust particular members of the administration, the underlying distrust of the administrative system remains. I could not say that I trust the administration's claims of commitment to diversity, because I don't believe that their commitment was strong enough to the problem in the past. They are committed to helping diversity under the new policy, which I distrust.

Statements were made that current administrative leaders were committed in the past to diversity. I had serious problems with these statements, and they again go back to the issue of trust. I cannot trust an administration telling me that they are committed to the admission and retention of ALANA students when in reality they are cutting funding for such groups. Programs such as housing vouchers, Native American support programs, and child care funding have been eliminated or severely decreased. As a result, many students have dropped out, and others have had to resort to academic-affecting measures to feed their children.

While these changes are being made, the salaries of administrative leaders are skyrocketing, and the establishment of an elite Commonwealth College within a public institution is being made. What does that say? What kind of commitment to change does that show? Don't pee on my leg and tell me it's raining. A coyer de pendejo a otro (take someone else as a fool), as I often say.

On the other hand, there is us. We are the students concerned with the issue. While I would prefer to discuss and arrive at a solution through diplomatic means, I am also committed to changing the policy by any means necessary. My commitment is such that I would be willing to get arrested to make sure strangers to me could get their sisters and brothers into this public institution. That's what I thought was lacking. That commitment to do what's right by any means necessary. Call me an extremist, but that's how much I love my people and other minority groups.

On a personal side note, I made some comments regarding the SGA and my views on their role in this situation. The administrators present suggested that the SGA would be the "proper" venue to represent our claims. What I meant (although I was heated at the time) was that since this University is 80 percent white, we could not expect that the student government representative of that community would be in tune with the special needs of minority students.

I also wanted to let the administrators know that the SGA took a long time to pass a simple resolution on the subject (while other colleges around had quick unanimous votes). Special situations demand special committees and meetings. I'm not trusting my concerns to an elected official if I don't know if he/she is willing to fight for what I want. It was also said that they couldn't establish new meetings soon because it wasn't viable. Yes we can! Governments in the world can change overnight. We can establish a simple meeting overnight, providing that the commitment is there. This also is my response to the chancellor's statements that he cannot establish a moratorium. So, don't tell us you're committed to racial, gender, and class diversity... DO IT!

To end, I'd like to thank the administrators who came and took the time to speak with us students. We appreciate it. If the administration wants to genuinely work with the students, they must prove their will toward fixing the problem, and not by the new measures. The new policy will simply not work. We have proved our commitment, we have proved that the new measures will not work, and we will fight them. Administrators, what I'm saying is that I want you to fight with us. The critical trust that you need from students is gone by your own actions. We can't ignore history. We will break down the imaginary affirmative action wall that prevents you from doing the right thing. Stop talking the talk and start walking the walk, because if not, we are going to walk for you.

As I sit at this desk, writing my editorials, I feel a great sense of power. My thoughts and feelings are being transmitted to the whole Pioneer Valley, giving you all my stance on usually pointless subjects. As members of the community, you have the right to write your own editorials or letters to the editor. Being a human in power, the status quo seems like the right way of doing things.

However, the "Book of Boo" speaks differently. Thus it is written in the "Book of Boo" that, "All free students hath the right to voice their own opinions in the face of social unrest." Since my alter ego is "Boo," I have no choice but to follow my own words. To save you all the trouble of writing to the Collegian (although you are encouraged to do so), I have created my own version of Mad Libs.

You too can be a columnist with the brand-spanking new UMadd Libs. These UMadd Libs are complete with current social issues surrounding our fair University. When you are done with them, mix and match with friends, put it up on your refrigerator, or just recycle it away (this column is MASSPIRG safe).

Advertising. It ain't what it used to be.

Does anyone out there remember those nifty days when the mass populace could have its independent thought torn away by a series of brightly colored, blatant lies? Ahh, the memories.

These were times when an honest person could come home from a long, hard day of work and sit down in front of the television to be deliberately brainwashed into thinking all sorts of absurd notions, like that shoes make one jump higher, that a good can of beer will basically increase the size of a man's genitals, or that it's possible to play professional basketball while indulging in a steady diet of artery-clogging cheeseburgers.

Gone are those commercial images that suggest wholesome and hearty ideals, like that soft-drinks taste better because famous people drink them, that it is a perfectly normal thing to be brought to orgasm by a shampoo, that we should all elect a bad actor to be our president, and that a cologne endorsed by a sweaty athlete like Michael Jordan somehow smells good.

Sadly, the lies are all gone. Now society is pummelled with the brutal realities of everyday life. Advertisements on television, show an obviously disturbed individual, that strangely resembles David Arquette, loitering around pay phones and scaring the passers-by with an overly enthusiastic AT&T jingle. Real life at its harshest: you can actually find people like that in big cities.

The beverage, Sprite, has actually given up on trying to take control of our minds as well. The poor sports in soda central now have Detroit Pistons superstar Grant Hill saying things like, "I get paid butt-loads of cash to stand here and drink this!" instead of the more comforting, "I'm perfect in every way and I drink this! You're less of person if you don't — in fact, I'd venture to say you're absolutely worthless if you don't!"

MJ would have said the latter. Grant, you should be ashamed.

In fact, this new infatuation with reality is quite scary. I can't imagine these corporations are seeing an increase in their sales with all of this, but they insist on pressing on with it. Life as we know it will never be the same.

It used to be that we would all view the real world through the happily distorted lens of advertising, putting us in a euphorically ignorant haze. Now, thanks to this renaissance of sorts, we are forced to look at society around us while being influenced by, well, portrayals of society around us.

Said a radio ad for Bull Moose Music, a store in Southern Maine: "We don't care about you, we just want your money!..."

I don't want to hear that. I want to believe that the people selling me CDs really feel for me, and understand my problems. I should be able to approach the drugged-up loser wearily existing behind the counter and tell him about my day, having him listen intently to my troubles and give me heart-felt advice before grabbing my week's paycheck and bugging up my music.

Come on, now. Truth, schmooth — don't give it to me straight, give it to me crooked, with several sharp angles and winding corners.

"Advertisements show an obviously disturbed individual that strangely resembles David Arquette, loitering around pay phones with an enthusiastic AT&T jingle."

The latest shift in this disgusting movement: lengthy disclaimers. How much more truthful can you get?

"... so if you're having problem with your genital herpes, try Valtrex — your problems will be all but solved.

Valtrex is not actually a cure for genital herpes, it just helps alleviate some of the symptoms, and then it sometimes doesn't even do anything. In fact, Valtrex's just a pill made up of random substances our scientists found around the house while staggeringly drunk one night. Touching this medicine could burn painful holes through your body tissue, causing you to writhe in horror before crumbling to your death in pure agony... or at least that's what Frank said. He's the one who contributed the most stuff to the formula, and boy, when he gets drunk — well, you don't want to know. Anyway, be careful. Bye."*

Back in the old days, they'd just let you mysteriously collapse with third degree burns. "Somebody will find the corpse, eventually," they would assume with a smile and a sigh.

Where's that connection now? I give up. We're all going to hell.

Privatization and you

We are student employees of the Textbook Annex, which is owned and run by the University. In the past few weeks our concern for our jobs has heightened as we are threatened with the possibility of privatization. We are writing this editorial to inform students about what could happen to their state University, their jobs, and their wallets.

Last December the Board of Trustees voted to have the University Store, the Textbook Annex, and the Campus Center Food Services reviewed by consultants, with a view to the privatizing these services. This would greatly affect ALL students at UMass Amherst. The Textbook Annex, University Store, and Campus Center Food Services would be run by private corporations such as Barnes & Noble and McDonald's.

So how would this affect you?

First of all, international students would lose their jobs because it is illegal for them to work for a private company. The jobs of all (other) students employed in these areas would be threatened as well. It is likely that a corporation would hire local residents rather than students. Private companies do not need to be flexible and accommodating of student needs and schedules. Once privatization has happened, most full-time staff would lose their jobs because the corporation would not want institutional employees.

"The Campus Center is the 'living room' of UMass. Would you like to have it replaced by a shopping mall?"

Courtney Baldanza & Katharine Berliant

The bottom line: private companies are motivated by profit. While they are willing to make promises and spend money to get on campus, profit will be more important than anything else once they are here. If you think book prices are high now at the Textbook Annex, you might find that with a private company they would increase dramatically. The five percent rebate offered on receipts would no longer exist. There would be fewer (or no) used books because a private company might not buy them back to resell.

If a McDonald's-type corporation ran food services, the Bluewall and other unique campus operations would be extinct. What would be next, student-run businesses like People's Market, Earthfoods, and the Bicycle Co-op? In a sense, the Campus Center is the "living room" of UMass. Would you like to have it replaced by a shopping mall? The whole atmosphere would change, and not for the better.

By having private corporations come in and manage these services, students will lose jobs and money. In the next few days students may be receiving phone calls asking for their opinions regarding the privatization of these services. Although privatization may sound nice, we will ultimately lose.

Courtney Baldanza and Katharine Berliant are UMass students.

Romeo and Juliet are given a new edge

By Imogen Lillywhite
Collegian Staff

COURTESY RNE ARTS CENTER

A scene from Romeo and Juliet, presented at the Rand Theater this past weekend.

In 400 years, Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet has been interpreted in a variety of unusual ways. From ballets to feature films alike, the star crossed lovers have known a fair few imitations. None, I don't think are as effective as the use of Shakespeare's original passionate verse.

James Vesce and Yael Prizant's UMass Theatre department's production with Matthew Ferraro and Melissa Fendell as Romeo and Juliet is one that is accessible to both student actors and audience while maintaining the substantial body of the original text. The production, which I saw at The Rand Theater on Friday night slips easily into its post modern setting. Ferraro and Fendell conveyed the conflicting innocence and passion which are essential to these physically and emotionally demanding roles. They were accompanied by Ruste Foster who was excellent as the effervescent Mercutio and Lauren Bergano who provided a thoroughly original interpretation of the Chorus along with many other talented students from the UMass Theater department.

An interesting aspect of this play is Prizant's and Vesce's decision to remove the roles of the parents of the two lovers from this production, as they were allegedly too difficult for such young actors to relate to. I think this is an underestimation of the talent that is clearly present in UMass Theater Department as Tary Chevalier and Van Farrier were extremely competent at playing the Nurse and Friar Laurence who are the older, more influential characters of the play. The parental roles were replaced by vaguer characters such as "Petruchio" and "Capulet's Cousin" which I don't think provided the necessary authoritative impact on the tragic fate of the lovers. When the parental roles are left intact, the horror of the inevitable tragic deaths of Romeo and Juliet is heightened by the fact that it is essentially the feud between their parents that has killed them. Without the parental authority, the feud becomes more reminiscent of the gang warfare featured in West Side Story which may well have been the intention.

Vesce's and Prizant's production is however, an excellent modernization. Their use of Pat Metheny's and Lyle May's music as well as elegant dance choreography by Teri Parker who also played a humorous Benvolio, is an ideal backdrop for their post modern setting. One of the many highlights of this production was Mercutio's famous Queen Mab speech behind which an exquisite solo dance was performed to represent Queen Mab. This production is a multi-media interpretation which is a welcome change from other bland, silent stage productions. Atmospheric music plays constantly in the background and earlier scenes are re-enacted in silhouette as a backdrop giving the play an eerie, supernatural ambiance. Romeo and Juliet will play again at 8 p.m. from April 6–10 at the Rand Theater.

The lyrical power of The Sweet Hereafter

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

THE SWEET HEREAFTER
Directed by Atom Egoyan
with Ian Holm, Sarah Polley, Bruce Greenwood

Atom Egoyan's The Sweet Hereafter is, by far, the most depressing movie ever made. I don't care if you're the president of the American Biker Guy Association (or something), it's impossible to watch this movie without drowning in sorrow. If you're looking for a good time, rent Swingers, or Clueless, or something in the Special Interests section.

To understand why The Sweet Hereafter is so emotionally overpowering is to understand the film itself — it is a movie about sadness, about pain, about suffering. The story idea is simple yet brutal: A bus accident in a small Canadian town kills most of the town's children, leaving one paralyzed. It is a story based on a real one, which took place in Texas, and which author Russell Banks (A Simple Plan) replaced in upstate New York, but the location doesn't matter — this is a story which could have taken place in any small town.

Like this winter's more Hollywoodized A Civil Action, The Sweet Hereafter concerns a lawyer (Ian Holm) who arrives in the town and must deal with the pain, suffering, and anger. He wants, selfishly, to give that anger a voice, and sue the bus company or anyone else who may have "caused" the accident.

Here's where director Atom Egoyan, one of the few truly avant-garde filmmakers working today, makes what could have been a melodramatic, overly done movie (i.e. Stepmom) into one of extreme lyrical beauty. He opens the film with his trademark slow left-to-right pan, this time across a wood floor, to an image of a couple sleeping naked among white sheets with their young baby. It is an image of serenity and extreme calmness, an image that cannot last.

Egoyan proceeds to unfold his story with no intention of making immediate sense. He weaves between the present and the past, showing the town before the accident and after. Using the incredible, haunting vistas of Canadian snow and cliffs as imagery, he wields his camera like a poet wields his pen, leaving no angle untouched. He is a visual master with no equal.

The Sweet Hereafter is as much about discovering the town's secrets as it is about the town's suffering. Each town member, from the fierce Billy Ansel (Bruce Greenwood) to the grief-stricken Delores, who drove the bus, are connected to the other characters in some way, or

ALANAI Honors Society rewards excellence

By Lanell James
Collegian Staff

Being one of the largest Registered Student Organization's (RSO) on campus, the ALANAI (Asian, Latino, African, Native American, International) Honors Society prepares, supports, and encourages students of color throughout the length of their academic career. To date, its members number more than a thousand students and graduates and all its members hold a minimum grade point average of 3.0.

The ALANAI Honors Society was founded in 1989, by Dr. Doris Clemmons along with a group of outstanding students and members of the University of Massachusetts community. In 1992, Naomi White Inniss, director of Multi- Cultural Affairs formed the first chapter in Springfield, MA at American International College. Initially called ALANA, which stands for Asian, Latino, African, Native American, the name was changed in 1998 to ALANAI to encompass international students and to reflect the broader diversity of the organization. Founded for the purpose of recognizing and encouraging students of color who are committed to academic excellence, the ALANAI Honors Society is a non-profit academic honors society. Also, it is the first honors society established by and for people of color in the New England area.

"When the ALANAI Honors Society was created in 1989, promoting the academic achievements of ALANAI students was its goal," said ALANAI Honors Society Vice-President Catina Smith.

> "Looking ahead, the ALANAI Honors Society has already taken steps that will make it part of the future of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst."
> Lanell James

According to Smith, the honors society wanted to make sure that the students of color at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, were saluted because of their scholastic accomplishments. Additionally, the ALANAI Honors Society was concerned about the financial resources available to ALANAI students, and it worked with students to locate financial support.

"Addressing these concerns and establishing a non-profit organization dedicated to ALANAI students was what the ALANAI community needed," Smith said.

Ten years later, the ALANAI Honors Society is still working hard for students of color.

"The honors society hosts many programs that are committed to ALANAI students," Smith said.

Coordinated by ALANAI, the mentorship program called Mentors Plus, connects administrators, graduate students, and undergraduates. Faculty from a range of academic disciplines serve as role models, mentors, and advisors. Additionally, faculty, administrators and graduate students from other local institutions also volunteer their time as mentors.

The Next Generation program, devoted to academic excellence in high schools, reaches into the community and recognizes high school students and promotes their academic achievements. The ALANAI Honors Society also awards students, and when possible, provides them with academic scholarships.

Looking ahead, the ALANAI Honors Society has already taken steps that will make it part of the future of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. The Academy Excel 2000+ program is the newest initiative proposed by the honors society. Its aim is to make sure that the needs of over 1500 ALANAI students with a grade point average of 3.0 or better are addressed during the University's current process of reconstruction.

"The program will help ALANAI students conduct research on scholarships, financial aid, internships, co-ops, full time employment, career goals, and graduate school. The program will also motivate students to build an environment that encourages friendships between ethnically diverse populations, and promotes different learning styles," Smith said.

According to Smith, the Academy Excel 2000+ program would work together with many different campus agencies and programs to enhance current University efforts of academic excellence within the ALANAI and student community at UMass.

The second goal of ALANAI and the Academy Excel 2000+ program is to become a permanent fixture at the University that is funded and embraced like other institutions have embraced Golden Key and Mortar Board.

"This action would ensure further collaboration with various agencies and programs, and most importantly secure student success," Smith said.

The ALANAI Honors Society will hold their 10th Annual ALANAI Honors Society Awards Banquet on May 6 at 7:00 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. Tickets are $13.00 and dinner is included.

"It's going to be a great time to come together and celebrate academic achievement," Smith said.

A People without history a tree without roots

Most of us think we've got it all figured out. We're secure with what we know and are too busy to try and study what we don't. The daily routine of work, work, play, doesn't lend much time for finding and understanding truth.

Not like it matters much anyway. Most of us aren't ready for the truth. It's easier to accept the things that have been spoon fed to us our entire lives.

It's okay, though. No one is mad at you. No one's even going to blame you for it.

But what if you could be shown the real? What if you were given the opportunity to see history like you never have before, the way many don't want you to see? Would you take it?

This isn't the plot to some new science fiction flick. This is reality.

On April 7, 1999, Ashra Kwesi will be at Mahar Auditorium, uncovering the truth and exposing the lies.

Ashra Kwesi is a modern day African griot. For those who don't know, a griot is a historian of sorts. They pass down the truth about our heritage and culture to the younger generations of African people. As it stands, there are many Africans in America who don't realize their true selves. They don't understand that they are not the descendants of slaves, but of the first people on earth.

This Wednesday, at 7:30 p.m., Ashra Kwesi will be speaking on a number of topics; primarily on the African origin of Christianity and the true story of The Resurrection.

Kwesi is known throughout the U.S. as a man who holds no punches. He doesn't forsake the truth to spare anyone's feelings. The shock of realizing that you've been lied to all your life is too much for some to handle. It's hard for a lot of people to let go of their conditioning.

Yet, without the truth, how can we ever hope to achieve our individual and communal goals?

We've been doing a lot of marching as of late. It's nothing new to this campus, though. If it seems like we're always going in circles, with regards to getting what we want for our people, it's because we are. We haven't realized our dreams, because not enough of us are in the fight. Those who know, haven't reached out and opened the eyes of those who do not. As long as only half of us are fighting, all of us will loose.

> "Until we realize the real truth about our history, we will forever be doomed to racial mediocrity."
> Humphrey brown III

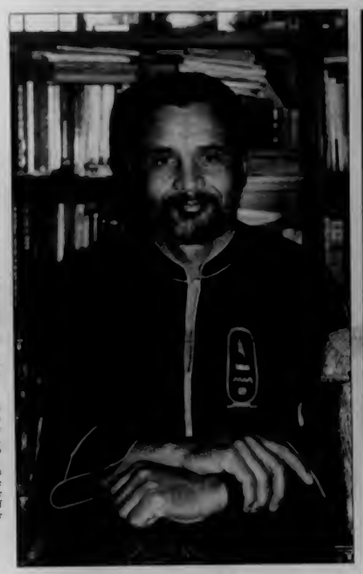
What has to happen, in order for there to be real change, is that there must be an awakening of the communal consciousness. We have to realize, all of us, that we are greater than the boundaries and parameters that we're placed under. Until we realize the real truth about our history, we will forever be doomed to racial mediocrity. We'll continue to settle for every lie and wrong that is placed upon us, because we don't know any better and think we deserve it.



What good is making a bunch of noise if you're just going to go back to living in silence?

One of the enemy's greatest weapons is knowledge. They will do one of two things. They'll either deny you access to true knowledge, or manipulate it and give you their version. Either way, you end up not having the tools necessary to defend yourself in mental warfare. Anyone can pick up a sign and wave it in the air, but do you really know what's written on it?

Phi Beta Sigma, in conjunction with Afrik-Am, has brought Ashra Kwesi to UMass so that he can continue the fight to erase the conditioning that has plagued our people for so many years. By learning the true history of our people, we get that much closer to making a better future for our people.

Let the griot speak and the children listen.

Humphrey brown III is a Collegian Columnist

Justice for Mumia

On Saturday, April 24 Mumia Abu Jamal will spend another birthday behind bars as he has done for the last 16 years of his life. Mumia is a black journalist and political activist known for his coverage of police brutality. He continues to speak and write from his cell as a death row inmate. His case has sparked much debate over the death penalty, racism, and classism in America.

So what happened on December 9, 1981? While driving a taxicab, Mumia came upon his brother being beaten by Officer Daniel Faulkner. Mumia tried to intervene. Faulkner was shot in the back, whirled around and shot Mumia in the chest. Faulkner was then shot fatally between the eyes. When more police arrived, they savagely beat him before taking the wounded Mumia to a hospital. Mumia survived the bullet wound and stood trial for the murder of Faulkner.

Why isn't this an open and shut case? Although many witnesses described someone else as the shooter of Faulkner, those witnesses never got a chance to testify. The bullet that killed officer Faulkner was identified by the medical examiner as a .44 caliber. Mumia carried a licensed .38 caliber. But the bullet, along with many other vital pieces of evidence, have mysteriously disappeared. Two months after Mumia's arrest, several officers came forward claiming that Mumia had confessed. Dr. Anthony Coletta who was by Mumia's side upon his arrival at the hospital said "he neither made any confessions to me, nor did he say anything that would be even remotely in the way of a confession to any other individual."

> "The bullet that killed officer Faulkner was identified by the medical examiner as a .44 caliber. Mumia carried a licensed .38 caliber."
> Rosaline Vakimond

Was it a fair trial? Although 45 percent of Philadelphia is black, only two were allowed in the jury because prosecutors used peremptory challenges to keep 10 qualified blacks off the jury, a practice later ruled unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court. Two of the seated jurors had a conflict of interest. One was married to a police officer and the other's best friend was a police officer. Judge Albert Sabo known as "the hanging judge" since he has sent the most people to death row than any other judge in the country, of which coincidentally only two have been white. Sabo would not allow Mumia to defend himself and assigned an inexperienced attorney to his case.

How is the injustice continuing? Mumia and his new lawyers appealed the conviction and were granted hearings to examine issues of judicial bias in 1996. But instead of giving Mumia's hearing to a new judge, Sabo was called out of retirement to rule In essence, whether he had conducted a fair trial. Of course Sabo concluded that he had. Mumia was denied a new trial. In June 1995 Pennsylvania Governor Thomas Ridge, signed Mumia's death warrant. The execution was only called off because of an international outcry.

There are many discrepancies involving the case. Why hasn't Mumia's brother come to his defense? Why hasn't there been an investigation as to another possible shooter? Is he guilty? Does he deserve the death penalty? Whether one believes that Mumia ought to be freed, it is evident that Abu Jamal deserves a new trial. The legal system owes Mumia at least a fair trial before silencing him.

Do you want to get involved? On April 24, 1999 there will be a Millions March for Mumia. Buses for Philadelphia will leave Haigis Mall at 5:00 a.m. and return at 7:00 p.m. the same day. For further information call the Western Mass. Mobilization for Mumia at 413-538-3857.

NYPD violence goes against their stated goals

In Feb. 4, Amadou Diallo a West African immigrant from Guinea-Bissau was brutally slain by four New York City policemen in the Bronx. Kenneth Boss, Sean Carroll, Edward McMellon and Richard Murphy pumped 19 hollow point bullets into his defenseless body. The cops claim that Diallo was reaching for a gun. He had no prior criminal history nor was he a suspect in any crime. Simply stated, he was black. The ensuing barrage of bullets that are outlawed by the Geneva Convention killed him instantly and still no gun was found.

Was it a reasonable response? Police brutality and the fate of New York's finest racist cops shall come to an end. This element continues to bear its ugly face more frequently in the inner city. It continues to inflict pain through death, torture, humiliation and permanent injury against our Asian, Latino, Native-American, African and gay community nationally and globally. Unfortunately this was an execution that the imperialist militia pride themselves on. Black leaders like David Dinkins, Jesse Jackson, Kweisi Mfume and actress Susan Sarandon have engaged in protests on their behalf with the local community fighting for justice.

As stated In the mission statement of the New York City Police Department (NYPD), "Our mission is to enhance the quality of life in our city by working in partnership with the community and in accordance with constitutional rights to enforce laws, preserve the peace, reduce fear and provide for a safe environment."

Values in partnership with the community, we pledge to "protect the lives and property of our fellow citizens and impartially enforce the law, fight crime both by preventing it and by aggressively pursuing violators of the law, maintain a higher standard of integrity than is generally expected of others because so much is expected of us and value human life, respect the dignity of each individual and render our services with courtesy and civility."

> "New York's finest maintain a defensive posture and attitude towards the Latino and Black community which breeds fear and alienation against them."
> Bryant Pheanious

Instead there remains a code of silence where officers are unwilling and afraid to incriminate their colleagues. High ranking officers turn a blind eye to and/or inadequately investigate police officers guilty of abuses. New York's finest maintain a defensive posture and attitude towards the Latino and Black community which breeds fear and alienation against them. The attitudes and actions of the NYPD in this case, make a mockery of the Mission and Value statement so emphatically stated. No longer shall we continue to let you survive on the blood of the Asian, Latino, African and the Native American communities.

On March 31, the four men were indicted on charges of murder and if found guilty will face 25 years to life in prison. A hearing is set to take place sometime in April.

Bryant Pheanious is a UMass student.

have surprises and secrets up their sleeve that Egoyan painstakingly uncovers.

One of those secrets involves Nicole (Sarah Polley), the young teenager who is paralyzed from the accident. She had dreams of becoming a singer, but now, those dreams are put on hold. It is her secret relationship and her knowledge that the whole case sits on, and perhaps the fate of the town as well, and her decision is both overwhelming and disturbing.

Egoyan supplies Nicole with the film's poetical metaphor — the lyrics of Robert Browning's The Pied Piper, which relates to Nicole's situation of being the only one left in the town as well as the role of Holm's lawyer and her father.

Holm has his own demons, too. His daughter has a drug problem and carelessly calls him for help, but Holm is helpless. He sympathizes with the town's people, saying to Billy, "We have all lost our children." The cry is too late and misused, but it is heartfelt all the same.

We learn more of why Holm is so heartbroken in the film's most devastating sequence. Up until now, Egoyan hasn't even shown us the actual bus accident, building up to it by showing the bus traveling calmly down the roads. Then he shows it to us, but not in close-up, not in numerous shots, a la Titanic, but in one brilliant shot, taken from the point of view of a helpless father. Directly after, Holm has a powerful and equally sad monologue about the day he almost lost his daughter.

In the end, The Sweet Hereafter, like all of Egoyan's films, is about loss, particularly how it relates to the dynamics of family and the community. How can a person, or a town, deal with such a horrible human tragedy as the loss of their children? The message of the film is that superficial revenge is not the answer. There is no answer. One must deal with the pain together, as a community, helping each other, because the past can never be brought or bought back. The "Sweet Hereafter" of The Sweet Hereafter is not heaven but the new town, encompassed in grief but also in newness. In the end, there is still hope, which is the one ticket to overcoming grief.

Lastly, the acting in the film is among the best you'll ever see, particularly from Holm, Greenwood and Polley (who also supplies the vocals on the excellent soundtrack). Nominated for two Academy Awards and the winner of the grand prize at Cannes last year, The Sweet Hereafter is the best film you've never heard of.

SARA STONES / COLLEGIAN

Sara MacNabb scored a goal and two assists in the Minutewomen's 15-10 win over Hofstra Friday afternoon.

The Minutewomen were also sparked by the play of MacNabb who not only had the two assists off the Korutz and Minaker goals but also found the back of the net in the first half with 11:21 remaining to give the Minutewomen a 4-2 edge at that point.

What makes MacNabb's effort all the more special was that she was diagnosed with tibia stress fractures in both legs earlier this week that could have required steal rods being inserted in her legs if the condition worsened.

"They thought about keeping me out, but they think that I'm recovering, so I'm on a day-to-day basis," MacNabb said. "I've been playing hard all season. I did my best to get some opportunities, and I'm just glad that I played well for the team."

Coach McClellan referred to a solid team effort when speaking of the game. Other players who fit this description for the Minutewomen on offense included Fay Naber, Rachel Ingraffea and the other senior co-captain Melissa Anderson who each tallied two goals apiece.

"We played a team game, and that's how we're successful. It was a nice team effort," McClellan said.

For the Flying Dutchwomen Kathleen McPike, Kaylie Howard and Kelly Dodson each scored two goals, but the star of the game for Hofstra goes to Heather Kain who had five points on three goals and two assists. The win became that much more important for three Minutewomen who share Kain's hometown of Baldwinsville, N.Y. Jessica Passanese, MacNabb and Anderson each knew Kain from home. All four of them attended C.W. Baker High School together.

"Last year we beat them by one goal; Heather Kain is from Baldwinsville, and attended the same high school as myself, Jessica and Melissa, she's Melissa's best friend. It's always a close game and I'm glad we came to play," MacNabb said.

The win gets the Minutewomen out of their recent two game slump. Now the Minutewomen look to take their new found momentum into the remainder of the regular season schedule.

"We've been losing a lot of close games, that we should have been winning. People weren't as confident, but Francesca gave us a nice pep-talk before the game that really means a lot and got us all fired up and excited," MacNabb said. "Now we can start over. Everyone is coming back from a slump, and hopefully this will be the start of a winning stretch."

Gustafsson goal lifts Maine to 3–2 win & National Title

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Marcus Gustafsson scored a goal on a rebound given up by Hockey East goalie of the year Ty Conklin at 10:50 of the overtime period to give Maine a 3–2 win over New Hampshire and secure the Black Bears second NCAA hockey National Championship.

Heading into the Frozen Four, held in Anheim, Calif. this weekend, the least likely team to head out with the trophy had to be the Black Bears. Boston College was on a phenomenal hot streak, New Hampshire owned the big ice surface, while Michigan State had tradition on their side. But the Black Bears used two tremendous performances by their junior net minder Alfie Michaud to defeat two Hockey East rivals and win the National Title.

The game winner on Saturday night at the Pond in Anheim developed when Cory Larose picked off a loose puck and fed Gustafsson in the slot who then let a wrister go, which was saved by Conklin but the rebound squirted loose and was chipped home by Gustafsson to the end the season.

The Black Bears owned a 2-0 lead late in the second period, before Mike Souza found a streaking Darren Haydar coming out of the penalty box on a breakaway who lifted the puck past Michaud to cut the deficit in half.

UNH would score midway through the third frame. Again it was the top line doing the damage for UNH, when Hobie Baker Winner Jason Krog found Souza alone in front and the Somerville native tipped the centering pass between Michaud's legs for a two all tie.

It seemed like Maine was beginning to lose the momentum that was all theirs in the first 35 minutes of the game. But when the two teams took the ice for the overtime period, it was all Maine. The Black Bears outshot the Wildcats 12-3. With this type of onslaught Maine should have ended the game a lot earlier then it actually did, but Conklin proved why he was the best goalie in Hockey East this season by making several spectacular saves on Maine's All-American defenseman David Cullen, Steve Kariya and Cory Larose.

In the other cage, it was Michaud using a 46 save performance in the final and his tremendous play in the semi-final, a 2-1 overtime defeat of Boston College, to earn him the Frozen Four's Most Valuable Player Honors.

With the win the underdog Black Bears can now boast their second National Title. It's the school's first since Paul Kariya led Black Bears won it in 1993.

COURTESY HOCKEY EAST

Alfie Michaud made 46 saves en route to helping the Maine Black Bears upset New Hampshire, 3–2 in overtime Saturday night. Michaud's effort allowed Maine to capture their second National Title.

after a streaking Eric Sopracasa tossed the ball to him on a breakaway down field.

Jay Negus continued to lead the Minutemen on the comeback trail, as he scored from dead center 15 feet away, just as Butler was about to equalize the teams after an extra-man opportunity.

The Maroon and White then squandered several chances to knot the affair before Tamerlano sealed the match while completing the hat trick.

This score was partially a result of Campolettano leaving the box again on a melee in front of the cage.

Tamerlano was able to scoop up the ball and quickly lob it into the back of the net to complete the scoring.

"The ball was jarred loose, and I decided to take a stab at it," Campolettano said. "Already down by a goal, it seemed like we had nothing to lose, so I took a chance."

Saturday's outcome could have detrimental implications concerning the post-season for UMass, but Cannella stresses that is not the issue at hand presently.

"We're concerned with getting better as a team right now," Cannella said. "We can't be concerned about whether we will make the tournament at this point."

Virginia, Duke, Syracuse and Johns Hopkins, four of the top six teams in the nation coming into this weekend, picked up relatively easy wins, with the surprise victory coming in Charlottesville. The No. 6 Cavaliers cruised over No. 5 Maryland, 13-4.

Duke downed Harvard, 14-9; Hopkins creamed North Carolina, 21-12; and the Orangemen handed Brown a 17-9 defeat.

No. 1 Loyola had a much tougher time with No. 17 Towson, but the Greyhounds benefitted from a goal from Todd Vizcarrondo with just under 4:00 to play to defeat the Tigers, 16-14.

Princeton, which struggled through the early part of its season, took home a 10-5 win over Yale in Connecticut for the Tigers' second win of the year.

In a battle of UMass opponents past and future, Hofstra held off Notre Dame, 10-9, in overtime. Chad Eisenhart, who had two goals against the Minutemen, scored the game- winner 2:11 into overtime.

A trio of one-goal games could have an impact on where teams sit in the national poll. No. 12 Navy can thank sophomore midfielder Adam Borcz for lifting the Midshipmen to 12-11 overtime win over seventh-ranked Georgetown. No. 8 Delaware, one of only three undefeated teams in Division I, escaped with a win over Rutgers, 19-18. And, No. 20 Cornell put down Pennsylvania, 10-9.

■ hat trick

teammates expect it, so they'll try to get it inside to me."

When halftime rolled around, the score was 8–2 in favor of UMass. Korutz had already tallied a hat-trick and an assist. She would eventually quiet down statistically, but she remained a constant offensive threat, drawing pressure off other potential scorers, like Minaker, co-captain Melissa Anderson, and attack Rachel Ingraffea.

"We tend to have one of these spells every year, and [Korutz] just needs to play through it," UMass Coach Francesca McClellan said. "She played through it. She played well. I was pleased."

Stadium changes could be costly

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — It took months to complete a deal to move a steam plant from the proposed site for a New England Patriots stadium, and it will take longer and cost more to ready that site for the project.

Football in a city on the banks of the Connecticut River was a draw for Patriots owner Robert Kraft. The state-financed stadium will be built beside that river, and literally on top of a second — the subterranean Park River.

That fact of geography, coupled with the highways and the web of utility lines that crisscross the Adriaen's Landing site, greatly increase the degree of difficulty — and the price tag — for the stadium.

"A report delivered Thursday to the Patriots says the job can be done within the $55 million allocated for infrastructure work and environmental cleanup as part of the $374 million stadium budget. "We've done a good job of identifying a site that has virtually every city utility running through it," Dave Ziaks, chief engineer with stadium consultant F.A. Hesketh & Associates, told federal, state and city officials at a recent meeting.

Phoenix Home Life Mutual Insurance Co., the chief corporate sponsor of the $1.3 billion Adriaen's Landing complex that includes the stadium, says the riverfront site will be worth the expense of relocating telephone lines, electrical lines, drainage pipes up to 84 inches wide and even boring tunnels under the Park River. The latest estimate for removing polluted soil and sealing off other pollution is $10.9 million.

With a deal in principle reached last week to move the CTG Resources Inc. steam plant and corporate headquarters, attention now will turn to preparing the site for stadium construction to start by June 15, 2000. That would leave two years to build the 68,000-seat stadium in time for the 2002 National Football League season.

Being part of Adriaen's Landing was a major reason the Patriots wanted to come to Hartford, said Robert W. Fiondella, the Phoenix president, chairman and chief executive officer.

"They want to be part of a center city revitalization," Fiondella said. "They are not that interested in a stand-alone stadium."

The goal is to weave a stadium into an urban area, linking it with surrounding streets and buildings to a degree rarely or never achieved before, said Bill Mead, the master planner for the Adriaen's Landing project. Adriaen's Landing also would feature a convention center, two hotels, 350 apartments, shopping and a 14-screen movie complex.

Adriaen's Landing architects and HOK Sports Facilities Group of Kansas City, Mo., the architects designing the stadium for the Patriots, recently began a series of meetings in Kansas City and Connecticut to work on integrating the stadium with the rest of the development.

The stadium's urban location has helped Gov. John G. Rowland and other stadium backers claim economic benefits of 2,700 new jobs and $107 million in direct spending the year the stadium opens for everything from parking to tickets to hotel rooms. Those figures are disputed by many economists who study stadium issues.

The continued disagreements between the Patriots ownership and the state of Connecticut might result in the Patriots staying in Foxborough Massachusetts.

UMass drops to Duquesne

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

In its first conference taste of the season, the Massachusetts baseball team (10-10, 1-2 Atlantic 10) dropped two of three to Duquesne (10-14, 2-1 A-10) on Friday and Saturday.

On Friday, the Minutemen ignited both games with three runs in the first in the top half of the doubleddipper. Senior Aaron Braunstein drove in one run and freshman Mike Kulak slapped a two-run double. The Dukes retaliated with one in the bottom half of the first to make it 3-1, UMass.

Neither team could muster a run until the fourth when Duquesne tallied three runs and one more in the fifth to take over the lead, 5-3.

In the top of the sixth inning UMass senior captain Seth Kaplan and Kulak would cross home plate off a Shaun Skeffington single to even up the score at 5-5. Duquesne squeezed out another run in the bottom half on a sacrifice by Jamie Pagone.

Massachusetts failed to take advantage of a second and third, two out situation, when Kulak grounded out to third to end the game with a score of 6-5.

The UMass men's baseball team couldn't pick off the Duquesne Dukes this weekend as they lost two-of-three against the Dukes.

Junior Travis Veracka dropped to 1-2 on the year while hurling a complete game, allowing seven hits and striking out five. Duquesne's Mike Lowder earned the win to keep his unbeaten streak at 2-0.

The second game began a mirror image of the first. The Minutemen produced three quick runs in the top of the first via a Duquesne error and singles by Braunstein and freshman Aaron Senez.

The Dukes tacked a run on in the third and added three more in the bottom of the fourth to overtake the lead, 4-3. Jerry Pepe, of Duquesne, roped a two-run double to help the cause. They managed another run in the fifth to lead by two, 5-3.

Again, UMass capitalized on a Duke's error, cutting the gap to one run. However, with Skeffington on third and two out, Braunstein struck out to end all hopes of a rally, leaving the score at 5-4.

Craig Szado pitched 5-2/3 innings, scattering seven hits while sitting six Duquesne batters. Jesse Santon relieved the sophomore in the sixth inning.

Kulak extended his hitting streak to six games while going 3-for-7 with a three RBI, a pair of doubles and scoring two runs. Braunstein totaled three hits on Friday while driving in two RBI. The senior outfielder also scored two runs.

Saturday turned out to be the only fruitful day for the Minutemen as they won 8-4 to close out the series. The only senior of the pitching staff, Bill Cooke, earned the win to bring his record to .500 at 2-2. The lefthander

Cruz to Marshall? Raf thinks transfer

By Seth Koenig and Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

As the off-season gets longer, the list of players on the Massachusetts men's basketball team continues to get shorter, as sophomore guard Rafael Cruz is exploring the option of transferring.

If he did, he would join seniors Charlton Clarke, Lari Ketner, Andy Maclay, and Ross Burns in leaving the program.

Unlike the seniors, who have exhausted their four years of collegiate athletic eligibility, Cruz is looking into transferring to Marshall University, where he will play for the Thundering Herd and coach Greg White.

But the transfer is not a done deal by any means. According to reports in the Daily Hampshire Gazette, coach Greg White has been quoted by the Associated Press as saying that the Thundering Herd do not need anymore guards. He further said that all their guards from a year ago were freshmen and sophomores.

It was further reported in the Gazette that Marshall only has one scholarship to give and that they are currently searching for a big man.

White commented to the Associated Press on the possible move involving Cruz leaving UMass and going to Marshall.

"Now it's just a matter of Rafael visiting us and us coming to agreement on terms," he said.

If Cruz does decide to leave, the news might not necessarily be all bad for coach Bruiser Flint and the Minutemen. Cruz's departure would open up another scholarship for off season recruiting, which would bring the Minutemen's total to three, having already used one to sign Milford Academy center Micah Brand to a letter of intent. Cruz struggled during the beginning of the season to rack up playing time, but later in the season received slightly more playing time.

Cruz's biggest game of the year was at home against Duquesne, during which the sophomore exploded for 16 points.

Against Marshall University, Cruz scored four points in 11 minutes. Host Marshall overpowered the favored Minutemen by a score of 88-66.

With junior forward Ajmal Basit, dismissed from the team because of his inability to work productively with the coach — and vice versa — and the loss of starting point guard Clarke to graduation, Cruz could have been a great asset to the team and a backcourt that has all of the sudden become undermanned. While transfer Shannon Crooks will become eligible to play next season, it has also been rumored that sophomore point guard Jonathan DePina might leave.

When quoted in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian March 12, Flint dismissed such a notion, saying that DePina — and forward Ronnell Blizzard, who has also been rumored to be looking elsewhere — had not told him that they were transferring. Flint also said, "If they want to leave, that's their decision. I'm definitely not pushing them out the door."

Coach Flint was not available for comment yesterday.

Butler takes UM in tight contest

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The 1999 Massachusetts men's lacrosse season has rapidly transformed into a destiny for disaster, or at least for vast disappointment.

The Minutemen (3-4) failed in their fourth straight match- up against a ranked opponent, falling 9-7 to No. 19 Butler on Saturday at Garber Field.

"We would have liked to have been 5-2, or 6-1 at this point," Cannella said. "To be honest we expect to win all of our games, but the team is going through growing pains, and we are really struggling."

The loss was the first home defeat of the season for UMass, who has now dropped three of their last four overall.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN
Keith Gabrielli scored a goal in the Massachusetts men's lacrosse loss to Butler on Saturday afternoon.

Unlike the team's previous loss to Hofstra where they were superb in the entire second half, the Minutemen opted to play their best lacrosse of the day in the first and fourth quarters against the 4-4 Bulldogs.

Butler outscored UMass 6-2 in the middle frames, as the Minutemen appeared to play without the intensity they brought in commencing and concluding the contest.

"The only way to win games is to play hard for the full 60 minutes," Cannella said. "I can't say they gave me that effort today, it would be hard to estimate a total for minutes they did."

The Minutemen found themselves ahead 3-2 at the end of one period, despite Butler leading scorer Cory Kahoun notching his 20th and 21st goals of the season in the quarter.

The latter of Kahoun's tallies came with only 13.4 seconds remaining before the first buzzer, as he beat UMass keeper Chris Campolettano unassisted.

The Bulldogs carried momentum into the second quarter, and snatched a 5-3 halftime advantage after consecutive goals from John Tamerlano, Matt McSweeney, Chris Vosburgh.

Vosburgh was able to get on the board after Campolettano came out of net to retrieve a loose ball allowing Vosburgh more room to punch home the ball to demoralize UMass heading to the lockers.

Mike Regan scored the opening goal of the third period for a three-goal Bulldog grip, before Rich Kunkel finally ended the Butler surge.

Kunkel fired in his second goal of the day, his 16th on the year, after Mike McKeefrey fed him from behind the net to assist on the play.

Curt Buss and John Tamerlano, on his way to a hat trick both scored to reaffirm Butler's stronghold for an 8-4 edge, before Keith Gabrielli closed out the quarter's scoring with 2:05 remaining.

UMass made a furious run at the end of the final frame, closing the deficit to 8-7 with 3:48 to play.

Previously, Mike Janowicz had slashed the lead to 8-6

Women's lax downs Hofstra

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Despite being outscored 8-7 in the second half the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team knocked off the Flying Dutchwomen of Hofstra by a score of 15-10 at Ruth J. Totman Field Friday afternoon.

The Minutewomen downed Hofstra with a solid team effort, but they were definitely sparked by the first half performance of senior co-captain Laura Korutz who tallied a hat trick in the first frame.

KARA STORES / COLLEGIAN
Rebecca Minaker collected three hard fought goals in the women's lax 15-10 beating of the Flying Dutchwomen.

It didn't take long for Korutz to electrify the packed house of Totman field and the pouring over of fans who were forced to sit on the hill. The Media, Penn. native scored her first of three goals with 16:21 to go in the first half to give UMass a 3-2 lead that they would never relinquish.

Korutz's goal opened the flood gates for the Minutewomen offense, as they scored the next five goals to take an 8-2 lead in at the halfway point of the game. Korutz added her second on a nice pass from Sara MacNabb to the right side of the net, Korutz received the pass and scored on a no-look backhanded shot to give the Minutewomen a 5-2 lead with 8:16 remaining.

"The one behind my back is my patented shot, I'll try that one every game and my teammates expect that, so they try to get it inside to me," Korutz said of her second goal.

Noelle Gorski also had a solid first half for the Minutewomen, scoring the first and sixth goal of the game for UMass. Korutz picked up her only assist of the game to round out her four point effort on Gorski's first goal.

Korutz hit a post early on in the first half, but finally made the hat trick official when she scored with 3:22 remaining in the half to put UMass up 7-2. The only thing between Korutz and a four goal afternoon was Hofstra, goalie Jenny Senra who made a save on a Korutz breakaway as the final seconds ticked off in first frame.

"It was a breakthrough game for us," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said. "In terms of team offense, Laura Korutz breaking out of her drought and in terms of team defense."

In terms of scoring for UMass, the half finished with shades of things to come for the remainder of the game,

Korutz nets hat trick in UMass W

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

It just took a little reworking for Laura Korutz to get back on track.

The senior co-captain of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team had been suffering a bit of a drought, struggling to put points on the board during four games where she could only manage one goal. Over that span, UMass went 2-2 without the benefit of a dominant Korutz.

In Friday afternoon's 15-10 victory over Hofstra, the Minutewomen got their captain back.

"I basically decided before the game that I needed to get out of my slump," Korutz said. "I wasn't going to get down on myself. If I couldn't score goals, I'd do other things to help the team."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Laura Korutz

Korutz then joined Assistant Coach Phil Barnes for roughly an hour's worth of shooting practice before the matchup began to solidify her decision.

All of the sudden, the bewildered 5-foot-2-incher began to grow a very large shadow. The fire that drove the attack to lead the team in scoring in each of the previous three seasons began to rekindle in her eyes, and it was clear once the ball went up that Hofstra was in a certain measure of trouble.

Following through with her commitment to helping the team in any way necessary, Korutz took the ball into the right side of the Dutchwomen defense and drew the attention of a number of energetic opponents.

Hofstra wasn't stupid. The defenders from Hempstead, N.Y., knew that Korutz had the ability to score at will against any given team, if hot. They weren't going to take any chances — they collapsed on the surging Minutewoman quickly.

Korutz completed the play by tossing the ball lightly over the aggressive Dutchwomen to teammate Noelle Gorski, who stood ignored deep in the middle of the Hofstra zone. Score.

"Laura sparked us in the beginning," UMass junior midfielder Rebecca Minaker, who scored three goals on the afternoon, said. "I fed off her."

Nearly 20 minutes and a goal later, Korutz struck yet again.

The attack took a pass and crossed in front of Flying Dutchwomen goalie Jenny Senra and looked off to the top of the circle as if to contemplate resetting the offense. Score again. In one quick motion, Korutz whipped an underhanded no-looker past an unsuspecting Senra.

"The one behind my back is my patented shot," Korutz said. "I'll try that one every game, and my

Loss puts lax in critical position

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

To hear members of either side describe this weekend's game between the Massachusetts and No. 19 Butler men's lacrosse teams, this game was pretty much considered a must-win.

And in the end, it was Butler that walked away from Richard F. Garber Field with the victory, 9-7, but not without a fight from the Minutemen.

The loss, however, now puts the Minutemen (3-4) in a tough situation. Next week, they travel to North Carolina to take on No. 2 Duke. The week after, top-ranked Loyola will visit Garber Field. And UMass' schedule doesn't get much easier after that two-game stretch, because Syracuse and Notre Dame come to town and the Minutemen visit New England rivals Harvard and Brown.

For the Bulldogs (4-5), on the other hand, the win could prove to be a big boost. They have already suffered defeats at the hands of the Blue Devils, North Carolina, Georgetown, Delaware and the Fighting Irish. Up next will be Gannon, before a western swing brings the Bulldogs to Denver and Air Force. But they finish up with Loyola and Virginia.

"Today was a critical game for both teams," Butler coach Jon Hind said. "[UMass] beat three teams they should beat and lost three games that were tougher. We beat three teams we should beat and lost the critical games."

That said, this game was critical for UMass, much like Hofstra last week, if the Minutemen are to gain a spot in this year's NCAA tournament. Now, if they are to make the postseason, they will need to pull off a major upset against one of the top-tier opponents remaining on the schedule.

"This pretty much keeps us out of the tournament. Our postseason is pretty much over," UMass' sophomore goaltender said. "But I think [UMass can pull off an upset]. This is anybody's game."

UMass coach Greg Cannella insists his team is not thinking of the NCAA tournament, and is instead focused on improvement.

"We're more concerned with getting better as a team," he said. "We have six games left, and we're not thinking about the tournament."

There are teams across the nation who are thinking about the tournament, and this weekend could have a big impact on who will be playing in mid-May.

Affirmative action still a heated issue

Scott faces, addresses protestors at forum

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

The sea of people pouring into Bartlett 65 yesterday afternoon flowed into the hall during a forum with the chancellor about the recent change in the admissions policy.

With signs held high, approximately 150 protestors stood among other students, staff and faculty questioning Chancellor David K. Scott after a presentation explaining the admissions policy change.

"I find that to be an insult to say you will listen but [won't take action]," said Chiquisha Robinson, a freshman criminal justice major, speaking on behalf of the protestors, about Scott's comment in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian that he would meet with students but not their demands. "I am insulted by the doublespeak."

The protestors then left singing, leaving approximately 150 people in the audience who questioned Scott.

The audience brought up many questions including why the change was made and why the University of Massachusetts community was not asked about the change.

"The reason for the change," Scott said, "[is the] recent legal context, particularly in the Boston Latin case."

Discussing the legal impetus for the change with the community would not have been "right" to do, he said.

"I don't think it would be right of me to ask the University... [for] input [on a decision made by the Supreme Court]," Scott said.

Some students asked about support programs for Asian, Latino, African and Native American students.

"We're good enough to put on stationary but we don't get space [for the Native American Support Services]," said Rechael Devaney, an undeclared sophomore.

Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos said the space the program received was the only one available.

Before the questioning, Scott explained the change. UMass diversity goals and plans to reach those goals.

However, "I don't expect what I will say today will do much to [relieve] that pain [from the change]," Scott said.

The primary change in admissions made race less significant in the applicant groups where it is used. Applicants are divided into six groups. Groups one, two and three have the highest grade point averages (GPA) and SAT scores and are usually all admitted based on the high marks.

In groups four, five and six where student's GPAs and SAT scores aren't as high, so other factors like the applicants essay and race, are taken into account. The change affects only categories four, five and six where race is now given less significance in the applicant's admission.

What has not changed, Scott said, is

Protestors block Whitmore entrance

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Student protesters physically blocked access to Whitmore Administration Building yesterday afternoon as a symbolic action protesting the recent administrative decision to de- emphasize race as a factor in admissions at the University of Massachusetts campus.

Approximately 100 protestors gathered shortly after 1:30 p.m. Some wove a web of colorful fabric ropes along the ramp entrance to represent the "web of lies" told by the administration. Others physically blocked access to the remaining two entrances by linking arms to form human chains and carpeting the ground with their bodies.

A large banner was unfurled that read, "Don't block access to higher education," while protestors chanted, "Hey ho Whitemore, time to open up the door."

But when students attempted to enter Whitmore, they were sent away. Freshman political science major Polina Ioffe had to access the building by climbing the ramp wall.

"I need to get into this fucking building. It's an emergency," she muttered as she was denied access to a side entrance. "I understand the point but I think it's ridiculous that I had to climb a three-foot brick wall to get into Whitmore to pay a phone bill."

Senior natural resource major Stuart Newman said he had to use physical force to go to work in the Dean of Students Office. "These people, the protestors, want equal access to the University, equal access for all, and they're denying us access," he said. "I really don't think that's fair."

At one point, Javier Cevallos came outside to tell the students that they were violating the picketing code, which states: "Students are prohibited from blocking free entry to or free exit from buildings, interfering with free movement, or presenting obstacles to regulate University activities."

The code definition of "obstacles" includes physical devices, bodies and signs. Any violation of the code could result in arrest or expulsion from the University.

U.S. keeps pressure on Yugoslavia

By George John

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Aided by clearing skies, NATO struck fuel depots, bridges and army barracks throughout Yugoslavia yesterday, and said it was taking particular aim at Serbian ground forces accused of terrorizing ethnic Albanians in Kosovo.

Yugoslav Presidents Slobodan Milosevic brushed off the continued barrage, defiantly promising to rebuild the bomb-damaged structures and denouncing NATO "aggressors" and "criminals."

As night fell, air raid sirens sounded again in Belgrade, heralding the 15th straight night of NATO bombardment.

Two strong detonations were heard late yesterday in the northern city of Novi Sad. Tanjug said, and Serbian television showed pictures of a huge fireball. The private news agency Beta quoted Navi Sad's mayor, Caslav Pupovic, as saying the power station at the city oil refinery had been hit.

NATO also targeted a fuel depot near Sombar, 12 miles south of the Hungarian border and the coal mining center of Aleksinac south of Belgrade, television reported.

Kursumlija, a drab industrial town on the road linking northeastern Kosovo with the military headquarters at Nis was also hit, Serb television said.

President Clinton promised an "undiminished, unceasing and unrelenting" air campaign. He said it would no longer be enough for Milosevic to just stop the killing. He said "a Kosovo denied its freedom and devoid of its people is not acceptable," adding, "Our plan is to persist until we prevail."

The 13th day of NATO airstrikes aimed to cut the Yugoslav military's lines of supply and transport — roads, bridges, airports, fuel depots and command centers. NATO officials said better weather yesterday allowed them to increase the number of bombing missions.

The better weather was little com-

Effects of privatization studied

By Veronica MacDonald
Collegian Correspondent

Several information sessions have recently been held on the University of Massachusetts campus to discuss the possible introduction of private companies in place of the current University-owned businesses.

The Advisory Task Force consists of 15 individuals, including students, faculty and staff with affiliations ranging from Food Services to the Student Government Association (SGA).

On April 22, consultants appointed by Chancellor David K. Scott, from the Campus Book Store Consulting Corporation of East Longmeadow and Cornyn Fasano Group for Food Services in Portland, Ore., will present the chancellor with a preliminary report.

The chancellor will form his opinion of privatization after knowledge of these facts, according to Kay Scanlan, news director of the UMass News Office.

Francis Martin, a supervisor in the Campus Center, has already formed his opinions. Two surveys have been created for students about privatization. The Office of Information Technology issued a survey on-line for graduate students, faculty and staff and SARIS is currently conducting a telephone survey for undergraduates.

Martin feels that several of the OIT on-line survey questions were leading. He equated the subject of asking whether individuals would like a McDonald's on campus with asking students "If you had a shoe shiner on campus, would you use it? Yes, of course they would," said Martin.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN
Consultants are currently collecting data on University Food Services, the Textbook Annex and the University Store to decide whether or not to privatize the Campus Center.

Martin also complains that there were no questions on the survey about improving the existing services.

At the heart of the issue for those in favor of privatization are student needs. According to Martin, privatization would eradicate federally funded student jobs, causing many to drop out. And those without college degrees will not learn valuable skills, receive enough pay at privatized jobs, or be able to compete for better work.

Martin also believes that fast food chains might not be supported by the public. He claims that food preferences of students change as they get older. High school and underclassmen tend to go for fast food, but upperclassmen do not because they tend to live off campus with a different lifestyle.

Ironically enough, Martin said that Starbucks was rejected from Whitmore's snack bar because of its taste.

Martin feels that job security is also an important issue that lacks in privatization. He feels that jobs on campus "are part of the educational process" and privatization would foster elitism.

On May 6, the advisory task force will meet with the chancellor and hear the recommendations of the consultants. The deadline for the campus to present research to the Board of Trustees is June 1, when the decision will be made on privatization.

Microsoft offers Web privacy

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Microsoft Corp. and a prominent technology group will offer a free digital tool kit that promises one day to allow consumers to use next-generation computer software to restrict what personal details Web sites collect about them.

These new tools, for Internet merchants, will help companies write electronic privacy promises that can automatically be interpreted by a Web browser or other software using a promising technology called the platform for privacy preferences, or P3P. Consumers today must manually find a company's online privacy statement, if one exists, and read through legalese to determine what personal information a Web site might be harvesting, such as their name, e-mail address, or even favorite authors or clothing sizes.

Using the new technology, a customer's Internet browser could review a company's promises electronically, then issue a warning only if it can't find a privacy statement or if the Web site wants more information than a consumer has indicated a willingness to disclose.

But widespread use of the technology is at least months away, in part because of a bitter patent dispute and because it almost certainly will require the tens of millions of people on the Internet to install new browser software.

"This is going to get a lot of the system up to speed quickly," said Tara Lemmey, executive director of the San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation.

The group was expected to make its announcement with Microsoft today, the opening day of an important privacy conference in Washington.

Both the Clinton administration and Congress have threatened the industry with tough new privacy laws — possibly by year's end — unless companies can adequately regulate themselves over ways they collect customer information across the Internet.

And the European Union already has passed laws that prohibit the transfer of personal information about its citizens without their consent to any outside country. The White House is negotiating to see how those laws might affect U.S. businesses.

"The technology they're announcing probably isn't the final answer, but it's a real positive step," said Rick White, who headed the Internet Caucus when he was a congressman from Washington state. "I'm not certain that technology will solve all the problems — there are some gaps you might have to fix in a legislative way."

The latest move is the industry's answer to what it describes as a frustrating chicken-and-egg problem: how to encourage Internet consumers to use the new privacy technology until Web sites begin to offer electronic promises that can be understood by the technology.

"What we're trying to do here is build a foundation," said Saul Klein, a group program manager at Microsoft. "We're not saying that we think this is the answer to self-regulation." Hurdles remain for the technology, including a legal battle with Seattle-based Intermind Corp., which earlier this year won a patent important to P3P.

Intermind has said it is willing to license the technology to other companies for a reasonable price.

"Good software patents are expensive, and we were way ahead of the curve," said Drummond Reed, the company's chief technology officer.

The World Wide Web Consortium, the Internet standards body over the new privacy technology, said the group is "looking seriously... at the validity and applicability of this patent."

"Even the threat that one company's patent could stand in the way of many months of collective work causes us serious concern," said Daniel Weitzner, head of the group's technology and society division.

The technology also must be built into the next generation of Internet browser software before consumers can use it. Many people continue using older browser versions years even after the latest become available.

"This is hardly the great white hope of solving the privacy problem if the time to propagate it is measured in years," said Janon Catteit of Junkbusters Corp., a New Jersey-based privacy group.

Microsoft and the Electronic Frontier Foundation said they will propose changes in a key specification controlled by the Web consortium, which would allow online merchants to use their new digital tools.

your actions." Cevallos warned as he left.

Another student who worked in Whitmore, Mark Johnson, came out of the building with a pair of scissors and began cutting the tangle of fabric ropes. When challenged by the protestors, he responded, "I'm a student here too. I have rights. I hear what you're saying and I support you, but I can't leave this building."

The protestors told him to leave by either of the two side entrances, and eventually he stopped cutting. A few minutes later, however, the protestors cut the ropes anyway to let a student in a wheelchair enter the building. Shortly after that, the protestors that were posted at the side entrances joined the larger group in front of the ramp and a student disc jockey played music that got the crowd dancing.

Despite the upbeat music, the protestors maintained focus as they continued to chant. The protest ended shortly before 3:30 p.m. as the group practiced the protest songs, "We will not be moved," and "We shall overcome," in preparation for a march to Bartlett Hall for an admissions policy forum with Chancellor Scott.

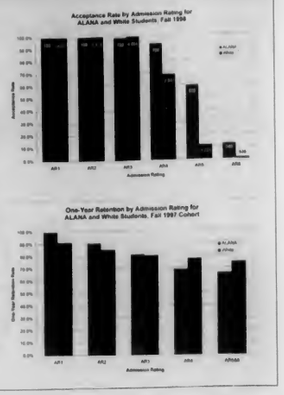
the role race plays when applicants are assigned to the six categories.

In an earlier press conference, Scott said UMass is working to find a different way to group applicants.

Scott also reiterated the point made by several University officials that the goal of the University is to recruit and retain a freshman class that reflects the diversity of the graduating seniors in Massachusetts.



Scott used the 1990 census to show that in Massachusetts, 17.5 percent of high school graduates are ALANA. Of those, 13.4 percent are in a four-year college.

Scott said in an earlier press conference that the rates of ALANA students are expected to decline over the next two years because retention will be emphasized. He said the rates could go as low as the 13.4 percent. The 1997 entering class was 20.7 percent ALANA students.

Scott's long term goal to increase diversity was outreach programs to recruit ALANA students in various towns. He also said allowing more low-income students will mean more ALANA students. But, he said, it will not totally compensate for the reduced role race plays in admissions.

But the protestors reaction to the presentation was made clear by one sign held behind Scott while he spoke.

"Chancellor Scott on affirmative action, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah," read the sign that received cheers and applause from the crowd when Scott noticed it.

Henderson enters guilty plea

By Sandy Shore
Associated Press

LARAMIE, Wyo. — One of two men charged in the killing of gay college student Matthew Shepard pleaded guilty yesterday to murder, admitting he tied the bleeding young man to a wooden fence and left him for dead on the prairie.

Russell Henderson, a 21-year-old high school dropout and roofer, avoided a trial and a possible death sentence with his plea. He was sentenced to two consecutive life terms and will not be eligible for parole. His only hope for release is a pardon.

Judy Shepard cried at the courtroom podium while talking about her son, then turned to Henderson: "I hope you never experience another day or night without experiencing the terror, humiliation, the hopelessness and helplessness that my son felt that night."

Authorities said Henderson and Aaron McKinney, 21, posed as homosexuals and lured the 5-foot-2, 105-pound Shepard out of a bar last October, kidnapped and pistol-whipped him and left him tied to a fence in the cold. The 21-year-old University of Wyoming student died five days later at a hospital.

The crime led to demands for stronger hate-crime laws around the country.

Although he pleaded guilty to felony murder and kidnaping, Henderson said his friend and co-defendant delivered the fatal blows.

He matter-of-factly recounted the grisly beating and his attempts to cover up his role, then asked forgiveness from his and Shepard's families.

"There is not a moment that goes by that I don't see what happened that night," he said. "I hope one day you will be able to find it in your heart to forgive me."

Henderson said he tried to stop the beating, but McKinney struck him with a gun when he spoke up. "Matthew looked really bad, so I told [McKinney] to stop. 'Matthew looked really bad, so I told [McKinney] to stop. 'Matthew looked really bad, so I told [McKinney] to stop. '

Abstinence and the law

Not long ago, Congress passed a law requiring that states teach children in grade schools that sex abstinence before marriage is the correct course. However, it seems many states have not followed this law and allocated money only for programs about sex education, not sex abstinence.

The law mandated that states create abstinence programs in classrooms which teach the harms of pre-marital sex. Effectively, as marriage is only legal for heterosexuals, classes would teach that heterosexual relationships are the acceptable standard.

Jason Weisenbach

The New York Times reported Sunday, though, that this law was followed fully, or only loosely followed by the states. North Carolina passed its own state law stating sex should occur in only "mutually faithful monogamous heterosexual relationships in the context of marriage" and used the federal money exactly for the law's intention.

However, Massachusetts and Kentucky, much to the disgust of those who support the law — such as the National Coalition for Abstinence Education — used the money mainly for media campaigns. Their campaigns, though, do not link sex to marriage or heterosexuality but instead promote that young people should wait for a committed relationship and until they feel comfortable with sex.

A spokesperson for the Sexuality Information and Education Council, which conducted the study of the law, suggests that states "tried to use the money in a way that made sense to them." Only four states used the message "abstinence only, until marriage," while most used a non–marriage–linked message or one about parental discussions with children about sex.

Even advocates of grade school sex education have noted that strictly following the federal law ignores sexually active teens. No contraception information programs could exist because the only ideal that could be taught is abstinence.

I feel that since the majority of states rebelled against the government's specific plan of promoting only heterosexual marital sex, it shows the law's inherent flaws. The law grounds itself in religious, primarily Christian, institutions. Religious morals certainly do not appeal to everyone; so while classes may not rely on religious texts for instruction, they certainly do not promote the freedom of religion.

Furthermore, as shown by the conservative stance taken by North Carolina, one of four states that followed the law, the sex abstinence law rejects everything that is not heterosexual. Thus, the law aims at further suppressing anyone who does not fit a specific sexual orientation, and it also implies that certain forms of sex are immoral.

The root of the sex abstinence classes and programs likely comes from a growing feeling that society's standards have deteriorated. However, have standards really declined, or have they simply changed?

Advocates of the federal law might cite that teen pregnancy would be greatly reduced by returning to the marital–sex–only standard of the past. Teen pregnancy can result in limits to the parents' education and limits to the child's because the teen parent must work to support him or her.

They might also state that a decline in the number of people who practice a religion in recent decades has led to pre–marital sex and that by promoting the religious abstinence ideal in the classroom, children would learn what parents no longer teach.

They might suggest that the 1950s was an ideal decade in which the large middle class had stable family structures. However, if one looks at the movement away from marital–sex–only to today's norms and how it occurred, the effectiveness of teaching the federal law becomes questionable, even if you do support it.

Pre–marital sex is not a new phenomenon. It is one that has been covered up, for when teens became pregnant years ago, they simply married. To me, today's norm is an improvement over this, for a couple no longer is forced into a marriage they may not want yet or at all.

Abstinence–only laws also reject the idea that sex is important in the foundation of a relationship. This is because, if marriage is an affirmation of life–long love (we'll ignore divorce here), then sex is something that cannot be included as part of the decision to marry.

However, I feel that sex with a partner is a necessary component of a relationship, and would not want to fully commit myself to someone without this occurring. What if I marry, but am unhappy with the sex? Must I force myself to live with that? I do not feel that mental bonds with a partner are the only criteria for the relationship I want, and I feel that a physical bond is necessary.

To teach only pre–marital abstinence creates the idea that sex can only exist with marital affirmation. However, sex is something that is natural, which abstinence ignores, for if it were natural to wait for marriage, few would have sex before it. Of course, people do wait, which suggests that abstinence is a culturally–based ideal, not a human desire.

Schools should provide sex education classes. However, they should not promote any cultural ideal but should open up students to choices they can make. Abstinence is one, but so is contraception and so is unprotected sex. Students should be made aware of the consequences of their choices as well. Moreover, I do not imply that consequences are negative; instead, schools should show the positive sides to sex within a relationship as well as the negative ones.

Thunder Road

Chancellor David K. Scott strode down the carpeted aisles of Bartlett 65 confidently yesterday afternoon. He reached the podium and paused for a moment, collecting himself and waiting for the crowd to quiet itself. In the face of all the angry affirmative action protesters, he confidently opened his arms, palms up, inviting and sure. A thin smile traced his lips as he opened up his mouth:

"Can I get a what–what?"

What a bold move. A bold, ballsy move. The protesters standing in the seats were dumbfounded. Finally someone spoke up: "What do you know? He's down. I'd even venture to say that he's street. Let's quit this scene and go down to Bart's for some malteds."

Mike Messaros

Later on, a beaming Chancellor Scott was witnessed at Bart's, pouring marshmallow topping on everyone's sundae. "It's a new dawn at UMass, peeps. Later on, let us go down to Newbury's and test drive the new TLC jam."

Overheard: "This guy knows his stuff. He can't be against diversity."

When I was in high school I did forensics. I did it because I misunderstood the name — I thought I was going to be opening up bodies like Jack Klugman on Quincy, M.D. (I made a similar mistake in getting all excited about the glass blowers at Sturbridge Village — who knew?) What I found out was that it had nothing to do with slicin' up dead people, but more to do with speech–making and debating.

The valuable lesson I took from this, besides the fact that chicks don't dig forensics ("You wanna dance?" "Uh, no." "Well, let me begin my argument of why you should dance with me by defining some key terms..." "While you do that, I'm going to go make out with that guy." "Oh. And, I still giving you a ride home?") is that with the right speech you can effect people in indescribable ways.

Here's an example: Previously, I was all upset because it wasn't warm out. I was, as they say out west, "bummed." But I saw a bumper sticker that said "Think Spring." And I said to myself, "Now that's the spirit. That's what I'll do, yessiree!"

See how simple it is? Think... Spring...

Which is why I've decided, as a final UMass challenge and a test of my oratory skills, that I'm going to convince Chancellor Scott to buy my car.

Now, I will miss my car. The white Honda has served me well over the years. It's seen weddings and funerals and carnivals and... car washes (God, my life sucks). But it's getting on in years.

So I've decided to sell it. To Chancellor David K. Scott.

Here's the pitch, Dave: Use the car to camouflage yourself from the angry students following you. You could dress up in some cutoff jeans and an old Grateful Dead shirt and drive out of the Chancellor's House, and when protesters surround the car, you can say, "No dudes, I am not the chancellor. Would the chancellor drive an '89 Honda? I doubt it. Do you happen to have any kind bud? I am off now, but tell that chancellor chap that he can kiss my rump." And off you'll be free to go, with a giggle and twinkle off to Worcester, where I hear you hang out (and don't deny it, because liars burn in hell. Check the Bible).

And let's keep this between you, me and the walls, but the Honda is a chick magnet. I think it's the fact that it's a compact hatchback. Are you sold yet?

Sure, I'll miss driving around on my slowly deflating tires, listening to that random tinny sound coming from the motor. I've been driving around with my windows open and the rock 'n' roll music blasting out of my two six–inch door– mounted speakers since the official start of "spring" a few weeks ago. I'll leave that to the chancellor.

And should you buy the car, you can live like I do: I pulled up to a few girls in a Jetta the other day and shouted over my rock 'n' roll, "How are you ladies doing? Me, I'm just driving around with my windows open enjoying the brisk weather and listening to my rock 'n' roll music."

"What was that," the driver said, rolling down her window, "I couldn't hear you because of..."

"Jiminy Crickets, roll up the f–in' window, idiot," her friend said. "It's freezing outside."

Looks like someone's not thinking spring.

UMass students are lemming–like

To the editor:

I am absolutely certain that UMass students do not want to act like lemmings. Yet lemming–like they act as they "follow the leader" on Friday afternoons, creeping sluggishly along Route 9, headed for Interstate 91 and points south and west.

If they are willing to break away from the pack and try something new, they will find that there is an alternative route that professional drivers have been using for quite some time. One can go south down Route 116 through South Hadley and into Holyoke, where one picks up signs for I–91. Voila! You're on your way with no frustration.

It's spring — time for some fresh driving behavior. Try it.

"Idiotic" piece was unresearched

To the editor:

On Friday, April 2, Brian Lohnes wrote an editorial entitled "News for the idiots." It was a good title because that is exactly the audience he was writing for. He states that The Minuteman is the Republican Club newsletter, which could not be further from the truth. The Republican Club does indeed have a newsletter, written each month by secretary Nick Tzitzon, which is distributed each month to the 155 members. Students may obtain a copy of it in the Student Union, room 423B.

The Minuteman is in no way part of, or published by, the Republican Club. It is a completely separate RSO. If the Republican Club chooses to purchase an advertisement, that is their prerogative. In fact, the University Democrats have expressed interest in purchasing an ad in next month's issue.

Later, Lohnes states that the Republican Club is under "the blindly dictatorial leadership of Paul Ferro." Yet, not one of the six leadership positions is held by him.

Mr. Lohnes calls upon the students of UMass to deposit The Minuteman in the trash to do all of us a favor. I have never heard anything so hypocritical in my life — calling for the destruction of a rival newspaper because he disagrees with an individual's editorial. Imagine a Minuteman staff member calling for the destruction of the Collegian.

In closing, Brian Lohnes says Brandon Beane must have a crush on the President because of how much "close attention" he has obviously paid to Mr. Clinton. No, Mr. Lohnes, it is called research. Perhaps a concept far beyond your grasp.

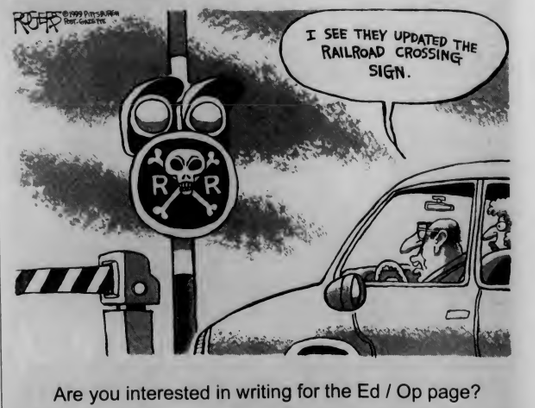
Professor's article not politically correct

To the editor:

When sociology Professor Paul Hollander decided to write the article in The Minuteman, he must not have considered that students would now envision the words, "I'm a bigot; Enter at your own risk," on his office door.

I am a graduate student who has had to sit in classes taught by men like you — men who did not understand nor care about what it feels like to be a student who is under– represented on a campus that has so many largely white men who only see diversity as an exercise in choosing what color tie to put on in the morning...

How does it feel to have a page–long article exactly two pages away from a column entitled "News for the Niggardly." What are you most proud of: that you were able to reach an audience with whom you can shallowly relate or that you managed to offend the "niggardly?" Oh, don't get me wrong now... I was able to differentiate between the terms "niggardly" and "nigger" long before reading Brandon Bean's little lesson in English.



I'd just like you to know that those of us who are under– represented and our allies, it's all the same insulting, cowardly, hogwash that we hear on a day–to–day basis. Are you happy that you could be a part of helping to get such a message across?

I apologize if I have misrepresented the "points" you were trying to make in your article, but as a Ph.D. degree candidate, I can't help but think that your inflammatory comments are even more ill–taken and more stinging to the undergraduates whom you have vowed to serve.

Please be aware that this is the chance you take when you value yourself and your group above others. It is the chance you take when you are not ashamed of blatantly disregarding diversity initiatives and what good there is in political correctness. It is the chance you take when you do not take the time to acknowledge your own biases and grow from the experience of just having done so.

You can't a what–what

There is a crisis affecting the minority community that is as serious as the current affirmative action debate. This issue, like affirmative action, strikes to the heart of equal access. Sadly, this issue also is demonstrative that racism and an unfair playing field still exist. The most disturbing thing of all is that most Americans do not know about it. This issue is a form of institutional racism known as the "Bias Code" used by broadcast advertisers.

In January of this year, the Federal Communication Commission released a study which revealed the Bias Code. The report illustrated that advertisers often pay less or even bypass minority–owned radio stations and radio stations that may attract too many black or Hispanic listeners. Since the white–owned, white–targeted media is the one in control and the biggest beneficiary, this issue has been swept under the rug.

Lenny Holston

Here is an example of the Bias Code at work. Stations, for example, with an "urban contemporary" format (hip–hop, R&B, dance, et al.) are at a financial disadvantage compared to their competitors that have different formats. Even though "urban" music genres like rap and R&B have been the top two selling forms of music in recent years, according to SoundScan, advertisers still shy away from these popular formats.

It does not even matter to Madison Avenue that the "urban contemporary" format stations usually have among the highest ratings in their respective markets. With this said, imagine how impossible it is for ethnic minorities to even broadcast to themselves.

A marketing major who may be reading this may think that it is an issue of demographics and which one is more affluent. That would be common sense. The thinking at work here, according to examples from the report, range from the offensive to the oppressive. One stated that blacks and Hispanics do not know how to shop. Another said that Hispanics do not use beauty supplies.

And many of the companies that the advertisers represented did want to have minorities in their places of business at all. Even though everyone's money is green, if your skin is not white advertisers do not want you (unless it is for cigarettes and alcohol, of course). The Bias Code leads to an average of 29 percent less ad revenue per listener than stations with "non–minority" programming.

Another fact missing regarding the ignorance of advertisers (since the report shows that there was little or no market research on their behalf backing their destructive rationales) is that 70 percent of the listeners and consumers of "urban" music are white. So not only is it harder for minorities to showcase their culture, it is harder for whites to partake in the multicultural experience that they truly hunger for.

Everywhere you go you hear Jay–Z or Busta Rhymes blaring from cars and dorm rooms, but the average Western Massachusetts resident, for example, is deprived of being able to hear the tunes they love on the radio. The Bias Code is the reason. Investing in this popular form of music is not worth it to many broadcasters.

This truth prohibits potential minority entrepreneurs from profiting from their own music. It goes on to further harm already established minority broadcasters. Ninety–one percent of advertising representatives of minority–owned stations had encountered advertisers who were unwilling to buy ads on their stations. Another alarming statistic is that 61 percent of the ads that were bought on minority stations are discounted by average of 59 percent. That is a loss of hundreds of millions of dollars.

"Diversity in the media is an endangered species as it is, this will insure the extinction of anything minority–related."

In situations where formats, the ratings and the demographics are the same, the ad revenue advantage still goes to the white–owned station. Take Washington, D.C., for instance. In 1997, WPGC–FM, WHUR–FM, and WKYS–FM, all of which target "urban" markets, all had similar ratings and demographics. WPGC–FM is owned by CBS. WHUR– FM and WKYS–FM are both black–owned. WHUR is owned by Howard University and WKYS is owned by RadioOne Inc., one of the largest minority broadcasters in the nation.

Since all of the important facts are equal you would think that these stations would have equal advertising revenue. Think again. The CBS (white)–owned WPGC–FM has a significantly larger amount of revenue from ads. The next four "mainstream" stations in the Washington, D.C. area, all of which with lower ratings, pull in greater than or equal ad dollars despite a smaller audience.

This inequality shows the problem of large radio conglomerates usurping the profitability of small ones. The current rate of corporate mergers shows that it is only a matter of time before all media are controlled by one entity. Diversity in the media is an endangered species as it is, this will insure extinction of anything minority–related.

The FCC report states that race is the major problem for stations, however, playing more of a role in broadcasting ad revenue gap than the size of the owner of the station. Vice–President Al Gore and FCC chairman Bill Kennard want a "voluntary" code of fair competition. This is an empty promise. Adherence to the 14th Amendment (equal protection under the law) should not be voluntary, it should be mandatory. Gore is just giving lip service so he can look good to minorities for his presidential bid. It also cannot be expected that he bite the hand that feeds him, corporate America.

This is an issue that should not disappear. We, as minorities, have so little representation in the media. The little we do have is mostly negative. If we all stand together then we can eliminate the Bias Code, we can start to represent ourselves.

Ten myths about affirmative action: Part 2

Scott Plous

Myth 7: You can't cure discrimination with discrimination. The problem with this myth is that it uses the same word — discrimination — to describe two very different things. Job discrimination is grounded in prejudice and exclusion whereas affirmative action is an effort to overcome prejudicial treatment through inclusion.

The most effective way to cure society of exclusionary practices is to make special efforts at inclusion, which is exactly what affirmative action does. The logic of affirmative action is no different than the logic of treating a nutrition deficiency with vitamin supplements. For a healthy person, high doses of vitamin supplements may be unnecessary or even harmful, but for a person whose system is out of balance, supplements are an efficient way to restore the body's balance.

Myth 8: Affirmative action tends to undermine the self– esteem of women or racial minorities. Although affirmative action may have this effect in some cases, interview studies and public opinion surveys suggest that reaction is rare. For instance, a recent Gallup poll asked employed blacks and employed white women whether they had ever felt others questioned their abilities because of affirmative action.

Nearly 90 percent of respondents said no (which is understandable–after all; white men, who have traditionally benefitted from preferential hiring, do not feel hampered by self–doubt or a loss in self–esteem).

Indeed, in many cases affirmative action may actually raise the self–esteem of women and minorities by providing them with employment and opportunities for advancement. There is also evidence that affirmative action policies increase job satisfaction and organizational commitment among beneficiaries.

Myth 9: Affirmative action is nothing more than an attempt at social engineering by liberal Democrats. In truth, affirmative action programs have spanned seven different presidential administrations — four Republican and three Democratic. Although the originating document of affirmative action was President Johnson's Executive Order 11246, the policy was significantly expanded in 1969 by President Nixon and then Secretary of Labor George Schultz. President Bush also enthusiastically signed the Civil Rights Act of 1991, which formally endorsed the principle of affirmative action.

Thus, despite the current split along party lines, affirmative action has traditionally enjoyed the support of Republicans as well as Democrats.

Myth 10: Support for affirmative action means support for preferential selection procedures that favor unqualified candidates over qualified candidates. Actually, most supporters of affirmative action oppose this type of preferential selection. Preferential selection procedures can be ordered along the following continuum:

1. Selection among equally qualified candidates. The mildest form of affirmative action selection occurs when a female or minority candidate is chosen from a pool of equally qualified applicants (e.g., students with identical college entrance scores). Survey research suggests that three–quarters of the public does not see this type of affirmative action as discriminatory.

2. Selection among comparable candidates. A somewhat stronger form occurs when female or minority candidates are roughly comparable to other candidates (e.g., their college entrance scores are lower, but not by a significant amount). The logic here is similar to the logic of selecting among equally qualified candidates: all that is needed is an understanding that, for example, predictions based on an SAT score of 620 are virtually indistinguishable from predictions based on an SAT score of 650.

3. Selection among unequal candidates. A still stronger form of affirmative action occurs when qualified female or minority candidates are chosen over candidates who are qualified. Although affirmative action is sometimes mistakenly equated with this form of preferential treatment, federal regulations explicitly prohibit affirmative action programs in which unqualified or unneeded employees are hired.

Even though these selection procedures occasionally blend into one (due in part to the difficulty of comparing incommensurable records), a few general observations can be made. First, of the four different procedures, the selection of women and minority members among equal or roughly comparable candidates has the greatest public support, adheres most closely to popular conceptions of procedural justice, and reduces the chances that affirmative action beneficiaries will be perceived as unqualified or undeserving.

Second, the selection of women and minority members among unequal candidates — used routinely in college admissions — has deeply divided the nation (with the strongest opposition coming from white males and conservative voters). And finally, the selection of unqualified candidates is not permitted under federal affirmative action guidelines and should not be equated with legal forms of affirmative action.

By distinguishing among these four different selection procedures, it becomes clear that opposition to stronger selection procedures need not imply opposition to milder ones. What is needed, I would argue, is less of an effort to caricature affirmative action and more of an effort to discuss which of its many forms are beneficial.

Rosa Parks

Adabella Perkins

Cinderella's family is mean to her, her fairy godmother comes and saves her, she meets the prince, they fall in love and they live happily ever after. These are the type of stories we are brought up with. As children, all the stories told to us are simplistic. If there is a problem, it is between two people and can be worked out on a personal basis. When something is introduced to us as children that addresses an issue like racism there always must be a happy ending.

This is true for the story we were all taught about Rosa Parks.

Before proceeding any further, please think about all that you know about the story of Rosa Parks. It probably goes a little something like this:

Rosa Parks was a poor seamstress who lived in Montgomery, Ala. during the 1950s when Jim Crow segregation still existed in the South. This meant, among other disgraceful things in this period in America's history, that African–Americans had to give up seats in the front of buses to the whites who boarded the bus and had to move to the back.

Parks was tired one day as she came home from work, so she sat down at the front of the bus. As the bus became crowded, a white man came boarded the bus and Rosa was asked to give her seat to him. She refused. The bus driver asked her to get up. It was very hot outside and she began to get stubborn. A police officer was called and Rosa was then arrested.

When African–Americans heard about this they became angry and, led by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., decided to boycott the Montgomery buses until everyone was able to ride the buses together. We are left with a feeling of how incredibly brave Parks was to stand up for herself that day.

This is a nice story but it leaves out many key factors that must be addressed. As Herbert Kohl said in his article "The Politics of Children's Literature; What's Wrong with the Rosa Parks Myth," "...we need a new story, one not only more in line with the truth but one that shows the organizational skills and determination of the African– American community in Montgomery and the role of the bus boycott in the larger struggle to desegregate Montgomery and the South.

Myth No. 1: Rosa Parks is seen as a random woman who was tired and simply did not want to give up her seat. She was, however, much more involved than this. She was, in fact, one of the first women in Montgomery to join the NAACP. She later became their secretary. She became good friends with the chapter president who was also the vice– president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. It was there she learned of the union struggles.

She was largely involved with the youth division of the NAACP. Also, since the 1954 Brown vs. the Board of Education Supreme Court decision, which declared that the segregation of schools was inherently unconstitutional, she had been working to desegregate Montgomery public schools. An innocent bystander to these events? Most definitely not.

Myth No. 2: The story goes that Rosa Parks sat at the front of the bus. The fact is that the first five–10 rows on the bus were reserved for whites. After these rows the "colored" section began. As the first rows began to fill up the African– American were legally obligated to give up their seats. Rosa Parks was sitting in the first row of this "colored" section, she was not trying to be disruptive.

Myth No. 3: It is said that Rosa Parks was stubborn and would not get up and that was why the bus driver called the police. This was not the first incident Rosa Parks had on a bus. She had been kicked off the bus before and some drivers would not even let her on. If she had not gotten arrested, or if charges had never been pressed, this probably would not be a story that we know today. It would have just been another day of some woman's life.

Myth No. 4: The story says that African–Americans suddenly became angry and then decided to boycott. The truth is that plans for a boycott had been underway for quite some time. They were looking for an action to have the boycott as a reaction. Along with other events, three other people had been arrested for doing the same thing Rosa Parks did. They were just not as respected by the community or able to have the strength to deal with the consequences as this inspirational woman.

These were the characteristics that the NAACP needed the spark of the boycott to possess.

Myth No. 5: Lastly, the story ends with the success of the boycott lead by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. This is the truth, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. did indeed lead the attack and it was the spark of this struggle. But there is more to it.

The boycott was planned by the Woman's Political Council, the president of the Montgomery chapter of the NAACP, as well as others in Montgomery. King had just moved into the community when he was asked to lead the boycott. He was reluctant at first but did finally give in.

Hopefully this has opened some eyes and perhaps helped give this amazing woman the respect she truly deserves. Individual conflict resolution is the stuff of fairy tales. The only way to really get justice is by working together. Rosa Parks was important indeed, but most important because she brought the oppressed together. This is her legacy and it was the model for the entire Civil Rights movement in the 1960s and will hopefully be the model for the struggle here at UMass.

Jehovah's Witnessing: 101

Tyson Peele

I am just your average University of Massachusetts student. I live in the dorms, I watch "The Simpsons" on Sundays and avoid that "Judge Judy" every other day. I study hard and reluctantly eat at the D.C. I also value my friends, family and my God, Jehovah.

It is somewhat en vogue to bash Christianity these days. Jehovah's Witnesses get more than their fair share of criticism. Yes, Jehovah's Witnesses are Christians. It is unfortunate that ignorance and misconceptions jade many people's view of what it is like to be a Witness. We are not a cult nor are we fanatics. Rather we just worship our god according to our understanding of the scriptures.

I was not raised as a Jehovah's Witness. I decided to become one on my own. I was halfway through the ninth grade when I made up my mind to make the commitment. I preached door to door with the help of an individual Witness who taught the teachings of the Bible. I did this for four months. After this I was baptized.

The misconception is that Jehovah's Witnesses are not Christians. We get baptized and we believe that Jesus is the messiah. "Mainstream" Christians believe Him to be God, Himself and we believe that He is the son of God. This does not mean that we see Him as any less important. We place an emphasis on the Lord's prayer. Jehovah's Witnesses put more into following God's word, which is a message of love.

Isiah 43:10 is the foundation of the name of Jehovah's Witnesses. "'You are my witnesses' is the utterance of Jehovah." The modern organization started in the late 1800s by Charles Taze Russell. He was raised in a Protestant faith and became upset that certain teachings were not agreeing with the Bible. To put it in historical perspective, which can be found in the Catholic Encyclopedia, as well as in other sources, early Christians were heavily persecuted by the Roman government. To avoid this, they altered their beliefs.

By the fourth century A.D., the church had become part of politics to appeal to the common culture. They created traditions and attached it to Biblical names. Even though these are not found in the Bible, they came to be understood as Christian beliefs.

Russell was just a normal man, Jehovah's Witnesses do not venerate him as a prophet or a saint.

Many are aware that Witnesses do not celebrate mainstream holidays. Religious holidays like Easter and Christmas are based on Roman paganism and are not found in the Bible. We do, however, commemorate what in the vernacular is known as Good Friday, the death of Jesus Christ. This is the only celebration the Bible tells Jehovah's Witnesses to honor and we do so annually. Other holidays, ,ike Independence Day, Thanksgiving, for example, are based on patriotism and this is against our belief in putting faith in God's kingdom. This is also the reason we do not pledge allegiance to the flag or fight in wars.

Birthdays are considered to give worship to individuals and is prohibited. The only two references in the Bible to birthdays involve someone's death (Matt. 14:6–11 and Gen. 40:20–22). Since the Bible does not even mention a date for Jesus' birth, the most significant figure in Christianity, we feel that there is no reason to celebrate anyone else's birthday. We do, however, celebrate accomplishments. Anniversaries, graduations, and the like are things that we may celebrate.

All Jehovah's Witnesses receive a Medical Directive card when they get baptized, which is updated annually. If we are ever unconscious, this is like our Medic Aiert bracelet. Acts 15:28–29 tells us to "keep abstaining... from blood" so this card informs medics not to give us blood transfusions. We do accept alternative treatments like non–blood volume expanders. We also accept bloodless organ transplants. This practice also makes good sense health–wise. It seems that every time the blood supply is considered safe, a new blood disease pops up.

Some wonder about our perspective on team sports. Joining teams is not forbidden, but it is discouraged. For Jehovah's Witnesses, the time restraints are unreasonable and so are the expectations of everyone involved.

Being one of Jehovah's Witnesses is not one of those religions you put on the shelf until there is a holiday, it is a lifetime commitment. It is not easy. However, doing what I am supposed to keeps me going. We meet three times a week. I also go door to door, as well as pray and meditate. The connotations of the word meditation is very different than what it actually is. Meditation is "pondering over the things of Jehovah and His teachings" according to 1 Tim. 4:15.

I would say that I am different than from most UMass students, after all. Like everyone else, I work very hard in school. But I do not let the stress of school–work take over my life. Because of the principles I live by, I have much better relationships with other people. I am able to have a positive attitude in life as well an optimistic hope for the future.

I also avoid trouble like drinking (and hangovers), drugs and smoking. One of the ways I benefit from my faith is that Witnesses are more diverse than most "mainstream" Christians. Our churches, which we call Kingdom Hall, are filled with people of different races as well as diverse life histories.

Those who say that we are cult are either misinformed or uninformed. Cults operate in secret and take control of people's lives. We are preach in public. We live by strict beliefs, but this does not mean someone is controlling our us. Unlike cults, we "carry (our) own load" (Gal. 6:5). The reason we all adhere closely to our beliefs is simply because we want to.

Keanu Reeves' brand new excellent adventure

Famous dude Keanu Reeves brings his trademark blank- faced acting to the mind-blowing action-adventure The Matrix.

By Adam Mortignetti
Collegian Staff

THE MATRIX
Directed By Andy and Larry Wachowski with Keanu Reeves, Lawerence Fishburne, Carrie-Ann Moss
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

Keanu Reeves has an uncanny knack for starring in action films, which end up dramatically affecting the genre. In 1994, Speed delighted audiences with its suspense/action blend and quickly brought on an onslaught of movies trying to follow in its footsteps.

With the Matrix, Reeves looks like he's done it again. The Matrix is an intriguing and perplexing blend of science fiction, action and modern day paranoia about the computer age.

The relentless ad campaign teased audiences with the claim "unfortunately, nobody can be told what the Matrix is. You have to see it for yourself." Nothing could be truer. The movie transcends most normal descriptions. It's so bizarre and indefinite that it really is hard to say what The Matrix is.

This sense of a false or imagined reality is exactly what makes the movie work though. Without revealing what the matrix is, the plot follows Reeves, who plays Neo, an online hacker disillusioned with the world around him. He dreams, but is unsure whether he ever wakes up from his dreams or if the dreams ever actually happened.

A mysterious phone call leads him on a journey to the "real" world — a desolate place where human existence is threatened. Humans created the mess though and humans can save the world, whatever that truly is. Neo and his group of "freed" rebel friends are trying to be those people.

If the above made no sense, don't worry, it's not much clearer when watching the movie. The Matrix makes no qualms about its story line though. It unabashedly questions reality and ultimately blurs the line between perception and reality. By the end, the audience is still trying to figure out the depth of what just happened or even if it happened at all. The film never rules out the possibility that the entire thing is an elaborate dream or just another computer simulation.

And while Reeves is definitely not an action hero, he can play the disbelieving innocent well. His switches from amazement to confidence only serve to further put the entire movie in doubt. Just as he's never sure, the audience too can never relax.

Reeves contrasts well with the perpetually cool Lawrence Fishburne. Fishburne plays Neo's omniscient guide, Morpheus, to perfection — he knows he's awesome without ever saying it. Morpheus dismisses Neo's dumbfounded disbelief with a smile and the knowledge that Neo will learn someday.

The Matrix follows a similar pattern. Aware of its incredible propositions and altered realities, the film, at times, allows the audience to sit back and ponder what the hell just happened. Every once in a while, there is a moment where we can stare in amazement and like Neo just respond with "Whoa." It's almost as if the movie is screaming out "do you get it?"

Lastly, the great special effects add the perfect artistic touch to the movie's theme. This is a world where people can move so fast that they can dodge bullets with ease; a world where one doesn't have to dodge bullets because they can stop them in mid air by dismissing their existence. Explosions never occur, but rather are sucked into some alternate reality. This is a world where you don't need to bend a spoon, because there is no spoon.

Through all of its clutter and glamorous special effects, The Matrix still manages to keep the audience interested in a story. There is a pervading sense of searching for some kind of answer or resolution. The action ends eventually, but there really is no definitive answer.

Whether this is good or bad can be debated, but personally, I think that the ending serves the movie well. The Matrix is supposed to question reality — to answer that or to try to define it is a task better left undone. The film accomplishes its purpose and does so in an original and highly entertaining way. Even if The Matrix can't be fully deciphered, it's something you should see, just to blow your mind. B

Rauschenberg talks about art

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

As a young artist, he awoke one morning with an urge to paint but no money for a canvas. Solution. He appropriated his own pillow and quilt, caking them with paint, toothpaste and fingernail polish, then mounting this concoction on a frame. "Bed" set off fireworks in the art world.

More than four decades later, Robert Rauschenberg remains a celebrated troublemaker and, at age 73, buster than ever. Too many ideas beckon, but he still can't say no. Despite his legendary status, he isn't a household name on a par with Tom Cruise or Monica Lewinsky or even his late artist-chum Andy Warhol. Nonetheless, his influence is enduring and inescapable. Even if you've never heard of him, he is known to you.

• First off, big up to Master P, who recently expanded his No Limit empire to the footware industry. Despite being cut by the Charlotte Hornets in his NBA tryout, da Last Don still managed to convince Converse to manufacture and market the new "MP" sneaker. However, he has also reportedly closed a deal with Correctol, a laxative company, demanding the commercial rights to his patented slogan "uuuughhhhhh!!!!!"

• As reported on the Internet, Black Moon and Smif 'N' Wessun are not the only Boot Campers with name problems. Supposedly their affiliates, O.G.C., have been persuaded to change their name from Originol Gun Clappaz to Originol Gum Chewaz. Frontman Strange Wondah noted that there are immense similarities between gum and guns (e.g. Bazooka Joe), and that the crew will continue to "still pop sh*t."

• Old Dirty Bastard has been a mainstay in the news lately for repeated arrests. The Daily Collegian caught up with the elderly-uncleanly-fatherless delinquent and asked him to explain his side of the story. ODB confidently expounded, "I'm sayin' though, namsayin'?!?!" We got cha.

• Rumor has it that Queens thugs Capone & Noreaga are back in the studio laying down tracks for a follow-up to the War Report. Although nothing is confirmed, the album looks to feature several dictators and despised political figures such as Khadafi and Mussolini as well as up-and-coming prospects Hussein and Milosevic.

• According to recent developments, it appears that Eminem has resurrected the Caucasian emcee to a marketable entity. Not only did Milkbone just sign with Death Row Records, but his first track is a dis to Slim Shady! If that doesn't tickle the funny bone, Cash Money's new product, I mean project, White Dawg, might. From recent ads, it appears that this assembly-line, screw-face, pseudo K-9 wannabe rapper looks like he may need some of that Master P endorsed Correctol, and after listening to his album, we all might.

• Speaking of laxatives, MaSe has finally dropped the first single "I Really Like It," from his executive-produced Harlem World. Despite its sweltering success on MTV and BET, various consumers have complained that it causes severe indigestion and possibly nausea and vomiting. Although warning labels have been authorized by the FDA, record sales are not expected to be affected.

• Lastly, with a whirlwind of speculation surrounding this year's Spring Concert, I was able to tap my inside source for the D.L. info. The exclusive word is that the show will attempt to make amends for last year's absence by featuring an array of talent from various musical spectrums. Hip-hop heads relax, the bill is packed with rap acts. The official (unofficial) line-up goes as follows: Wu-Tang, Dave Matthews Band, Jay Z, N Sync, R.E.M., Slayer, Phish, Beastie Boys, Jewel, The Cure and DMX... oh yeah and Busted Fro. Regardless of its free admission, the concert anticipates lasting around 12 hours to ensure the students get their money's worth. (Information subject to change.)

That's about it... Keep the pulses pulsating and stay tuned.

Love and Rockets hit Boston with lovely rock jams

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

LOVE AND ROCKETS
Avalon Ballroom
April 3

BOSTON — Marking their third visit to Boston in the past year, Daniel Ash, David J. and Kevin Haskins packed the Avalon Saturday night in support of Love and Rockets' latest release, Lift.

As Love and Rockets, Ash, J. and Haskins were given the freedom to branch out to new terrain. Whereas their Bauhaus bandmate, Peter Murphy, went on to embrace the gothic and take it on a more pop-oriented route, Love and Rockets decided to do the opposite. They all but abandoned their death-rock roots and became more experimental.

The 80's synth rock group Tones on Tail (consisting of just Ash and Haskins) was the obvious transition from Bauhaus (disbanded in 1983) to Love and Rockets. From the first Tones on Tail release to Lift, these guys have never released two similar sounding albums.

Lift is extremely different from Love and Rockets' previous albums. The techno-like sound on Lift is not just another example of a pop artist jumping on the electronic bandwagon. Love and Rockets have been playing with different genres for years — their turn to electronica was inevitable, just surprising that they didn't do it sooner.

Opening up with "My Drug" from Lift, Ash and J. took full advantage of their blacklight illuminated stage — J. wearing a reflective jogging suit, and Ash wearing glow bracelets.

The first half of their set consisted solely of material from Lift. "R.I.P 2Uc," "Holy Fool," "Deep Deep Down," and "Delicious Ocean" were some early highlights. "Party's Not Over" carried with it a haunting, Portishead- esque sound that transferred well to a live setting.

The crowd's reaction to the older material was that of pure excitement. "Kundali Express" marked the point where the techno was put away for the night.

From this point on Love and Rockets delivered straight rock, with songs including "Mirror People (fast and slow)," "Ying Yang, the Flower Pot Man," "Holiday on the Moon," and "Sweet F.A."

They returned for three encores, which included the hit "No New Tale to Tell" from the album Earth Sun Moon. Ash had his fun by leaning into the crowd, and tossing his microphone to random audience members.

Love and Rockets managed to put on a stunning show, that went off without a hitch. Their Bauhaus days hinged on the theatricality of frontman Murphy, but since then Ash, J. and Haskins have proved themselves skilled musicians and excellent performers.

The Collegian Poll Rules:

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian's "UMass' Best" is intended to be a good-natured contest among the local community. It is a fun poll based solely on UMass student opinions. This is not a competition whose results should have deep or lasting significance. Please do not take it as such, but rather as an informal published poll.

road of success, will head due south to Connecticut this Saturday. They will face a field including Iona, Holy Cross, Providence, and Connecticut, all of which will pose stiff competition for their Amherst foes.

The meet should be an interesting one, according to O'Brien.

"We should go through [our] greatest challenge [of the year]," he said.

it on Robert Rauschenberg," begins the new "American Masters" exploration into this man of dazzling culpability. It airs tomorrow at 10 p.m. on PBS.

"Robert Rauschenberg: Inventive Genius" tracks the unlikely success of a boy with a gift for drawing and, unbeknownst to anyone, dyslexia. This was in the gritty oil-refinery town of Port Arthur, Texas, where he considered being a preacher — except preachers weren't allowed to dance.

By the early 1950s, the grateful expatriate would find his way to New York, just in time for an artistic revolution. Encountering the radical new movement of abstract expressionism, Rauschenberg became an eager participant. But all by himself he was also a movement, defined by whatever crossed his mind.

A cunning scavenger, he crafted sculptures from junk he found on New York sidewalks — perhaps most notably a stuffed angora goat he girdled with a tire. A pioneer of performance art, he danced with the avant-garde Merce Cunningham troupe after equipping the company with parachutes and roller skates. He fashioned images clipped from magazines and newspapers into rapturous collages. He designed a record album for the rock group Talking Heads.

Rauschenberg has famously said that he operates in the gap between art and life. At the same time, he does his best to fill another gap. "I think humor is an adhesive that joins tragedy and happiness together," he explains, then makes a pleased self-appraisal: "I'm still sticky!" At that, he laughs his Bob Rauschenberg laugh, a full-throttle chortle overwhelming and infectious. Like his art.

Rauschenberg spends much of his time and does much of his work at his 37-acre compound on Captiva Island, Fla. But on a recent afternoon, he has welcomed me to his Greenwich Village home, a five-story former church, where we chat in his kitchen. We last spoke in the mid-1970s. By then well into middle age, he noted that "maturity is usually associated with reducing your life to a state of controlled boredom. So most people assume that one is supposed to outgrow things like spontaneity and wild thoughts."

It's an obvious now as it was then: Rauschenberg isn't buying. On the contrary, the older he grows, the more plentiful his wild and whimsical thoughts. "I know a lot of painters who say they just don't have any ideas. I can't imagine it!" he marvels. "Other people think of ideas as if they're some kind of object. Like a chair. "But you don't need a chair. You can stand up!"

He's speaking figuratively, of course, but in fact he seems never to sit — even when others do. A sturdy man in work shirt and chinos, he is standing right now at his kitchen table. He sips the drink before him and thinks back to his arrival in New York when he had 25 cents a day for food. But it was no hardship. "If you had to, you could just live off the excitement in the air," he says. "In the company of other artists, even though you were not doing what many of them did or what they necessarily approved of you were still happy."

Not that his contentment was shared by his elders, a mostly gloom-and-doom crowd governed by artistic angst. "It was night after night with [Jackson] Pollock, [Franz] Kline, [Mark] Rothko," Rauschenberg recalls fondly. "They were so busy crying in their 15-cent beer! I don't like beer, and I certainly don't like tears in my beer. But they couldn't stop talking about themselves, so I learned a lot!" Rauschenberg guns his chuckle. "Meanwhile, none of my contemporaries considered me a threat. I was considered a harmless clown. So I was well on my way to being notorious by the time they noticed. 'Maybe he's serious!'"

As "Robert Rauschenberg: Inventive Genius" makes clear, no one ever made that mistake again.

Here we go again..here we go again..same old stuff again...same old stuff again..ridin' down my avenue..a Collegian for you and a Collegian for me.....Woo-hoo..life is ah-yeah...livin' large!

UMass men's track finishes second

By Erik Haan
Collegian Correspondent

Vic Morency led the way for the Massachusetts men's track and field squad as the Minutemen placed second in a field of eight at the University of Pennsylvania Invitational on Saturday. The junior used momentum from the Florida Relays in which he broke the school record for the javelin throw, to help the UMass cause.

Morency was a double winner, taking both the javelin and discus in convincing fashion. His distance for the javelin was 218-feet-10-inches, out-throwing his closest competitor by almost seven feet.

His discus toss resulted in a mark of 178-feet-6-inches. That mark was far and away the best of the day, as his nearest foe could manage to get only within 24 feet of the second longest throw in UMass history. Morency's throw was also the longest of the season.

The junior's outstanding performance was backed by the strength of his teammates.

Senior B.J. Cardoza was victorious in the hammer throw, crushing his competition with a distance of 190-feet-3- inches. That mark was approximately 13 feet longer than the throw by Matt Pagliasotti of Penn, who finished second.

Senior Tom Toye, sophomore Brendan Sullivan, and senior Ben Baraldi also contributed with second place finishes in the 200m dash, 3,000m steeplechase, and 110m hurdles, respectively. Each of those marks was good enough for those Minutemen to qualify for the New England Championships.

"Overall, the meet was a good experience for the team," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "There really weren't any surprises... We expected the teams that finished 1-2-3 to be in the running, and that's exactly what happened."

O'Brien was pleased with the overall result of the meet, and went on to add that any disappointments would be overcome with more practice.

"The month layoff from the indoor track season was a little bit of a concern, but we'll just keep working hard and we should be in good shape in no time," he said.

The team was fighting for the victory with seven other clubs, and earned 145 points with its second-place finish. Penn finished first, accumulating 176 points.

The rest of the field was led by Cornell, who finished third with 128 points, and was followed by Fairleigh Dickinson (77), St. Joseph's (71.50), La Salle (61), Kutztown (59.5) and Rowan (45).

relay was 48.98 seconds. The other UMass entry in the event finished with a time of 49.17 seconds.

The Minutewomen also took home first in the 4x400 relay with a time of 4:00.49 seconds, in completing the weekend's relay dominance.

Massachusetts also had a strong performance from senior Nicole Way, who claimed second place in the 1,500m with a time of 4:39.42.

Other strong performances came from the underclassmen of UMass. Sophomore Chrystal Murphy captured second in the 100m hurdles, solidifying UMass' claim to the top three spots in the hurdle event. Sophomore Erin Hankard captured a third-place finish in the 400m with a time of 1:07.59, while sophomore Carole LaPlante of Gardiner, Maine took second in the shot put with a throw of 12.85 meters.

The Minutewomen return to action this weekend when the team travels south to Husky country for a six-team meet on Saturday, April 17. The University of Connecticut will host the Eagles of Boston College, Brown University, Rhode Island and the Syracuse Orangemen. The meet is scheduled to begin at 11 a.m.

Softball loses rare A–10 game on Philly road trip

Minutewomen will be without Bakken today during doubleheader

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Something was rotten in the state of Pennsylvania last weekend.

The first stench of trouble came Saturday, when a lack- luster Massachusetts softball team crept past host and Atlantic 10 foe Temple, 1–0, in the opening game of the doubleheader.

UMass responded in the following contest with a decisive 5–1 victory; however, on Sunday at St. Joseph's, the Minutewomen would twice suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune, eventually losing to the Hawks, 4–3 in the second game of the doubleheader.

The initial setback occurred during the fifth inning of the first game, when designated hitter Ashley Bakken slid awkwardly into second base, breaking her left hand in three places — two broken bones in the ring finger, and one just below the pinkie. As the second–best hitter on her team, Bakken leaves UMass in somewhat of a frantic disposition. Coach Elaine Sortino must look to her bench and find a replacement for Bakken's .283 batting average and .353 on- base percentage.

"We have enough depth in our personell offensively and defensively so that we can regroup and do some things differently," Sortino said optimistically.

The freshman phenom will be absent from the line-up for at least a short while, until the team physician and Sortino can formulate a plan to somehow intigrate her into the Minutewoman game plan. In addition to her ability at the plate, Bakken is also an extremely fast base runner. Sortino is hoping, at the very least, that she can contribute as a pinch runner.

"She's going to be allowed to play. She's going to be allowed to pinch run," Sortino said of Bakken.

"Our trainers and our doctors are working at ringing up a way that we can use her offensively as soon as possible. I don't think that we're going to see Ashley out that long."

Despite the abrupt injury, UMass escaped with a 1–0 win, behind the mayhem that senior pitching ace Danielle Henderson continually creates for her opponents. The All-American struck out 14 Hawks en route to her second no- hitter in four days.

"Sunday's game was a continuation of [our] flat [play]," Sortino said.

"We were very, very fortunate. I think we dodged bullets in the 1–0 game against Temple, and I think we dodged cannon balls in the 1–0 game against St. Joe's."

After creeping through the opening game, UMass endured the second setback during the final contest of Sunday afternoon. Reeling from the Bakken injury, the Minutewomen sailed into a sea of trouble, falling to St. Joseph's, 4–3. The defeat dropped UMass to 20–8 overall, and added a blemish to its usually stellar conference record, which is now 3–1.

"We were very unagressive at the plate and that's why I think we found ourselves at the losing end of a 4–3 decision in the second game," Sortino said of the rare A–10 defeat for UMass, which must now regroup for today's contest against Central Connecticut.

Perhaps there was a special providence in the fall of the Minutewomen on Sunday. Sortino is hoping that her squad will learn from its sub–par weekend in Philadelphia, and enter today's 3 p.m. doubleheader at Totman Field with renewed intensity. The Devils may serve as the perfect springboard for UMass confidence. They enter the competition as losers of 11 straight with a dismal mark of 3–15.

"We have to be a lot more motivated when we play Central Connecticut," Sortino said.

"The tone and intensity that we take the field with is more important than anything else this season. We have got to turn around the aura of our team over the last weekend. We cannot afford to take any opponent lightly."

Minutewoman Notes: It was a wild weekend for UMass, and it became even crazier when senior second baseman Mandy Galas suddenly become a deep threat. Somehow, though, there has been a method to this madness. Although more widely–known as a slapper/bunter/hitter type, Galas has homered twice this season, including a sixth–inning blast over the right field fence to propell her team to a 1–0 win over St. Joe's. The homerun also insured Henderson's third no–hitter of the 1999 campaign.

Miele fights her way into prominence with UM lax

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

After high school, Melissa Miele had no Pennsylvania state lacrosse titles to show for her four years at Upper Darby.

No big–name lacrosse schools around the nation littered her mailbox with letters, and it seemed that the writing was on the wall that the Drexel Hill, Pa. native was destined to play for one of a number of smaller, local colleges that showed interested in her.

"You hear about everybody else's high school team going to states [championships] and winning states and being awesome, and then you talk about my high school, and we won three games if we were lucky," Miele said.

I got recruited by some Division II and Division III teams, but I wanted to try and play Division I."

Miele passed up schools like Wooster and Gannon to get a chance at a D–I lacrosse program, and zeroed in on the University of Massachusetts. Although the cards were stacked against her, she went ahead with her decision.

In an era in which the phrase "the love of the game" is vastly overused, that is exactly what Miele was playing for.

"I started playing lacrosse in middle school," Miele said. "My high school team was really bad, but I really like lacrosse and I wanted to play in college.

"I don't have a scholarship here or anything, I just walked on."

"Did we think she was a player? We really didn't know," reflected UMass coach Francesca McClellan. "We had an assistant coach who saw her play in high school and we were told she was a solid player. The thing is, you never can tell how somebody is going to be in college based on their play in high school. Some of them can't play at this level, and some rise to the occasion. She was clearly an example of someone who rose to the occasion."

Through a hard series of try–outs, the defender played against the odds to work her way into the favor of the coaching staff.

"She came in as a walk–on, and is certainly somebody who impressed us," McClellan said. "She came in as a top–notch figure skater, and that showed on the field in her mental toughness."

The rest, as the saying goes, is history.

"I was really surprised when I made it," Miele said. "There was another girl from near where I lived named Meghan Magee, who tried out with me. I remember going with her to see if we made it, and we did. I was real excited about that. I was kind of surprised because I knew that most of the people that were coming [to practices] seemed to have scholarships and I didn't, so I didn't know how that was going to work."

Still, after making the team, Miele spent the next two seasons playing somewhat sparingly, and although No. 29 wasn't used to staying on the bench, she made use of the time she played.

"Even before she started getting all of this playing time, she never let us forget about her, by going out and playing hard all the time," McClellan said. "Even when she was coming off the bench, she always came out and had a great performance. She never really has a bad game."

With perseverance and determination, the high schooler that Division I originally overlooked worked her way into a starting role just a few games into her junior year.

Miele's play has continued to improve over the course of the current season, as the junior has picked her game up yet another notch in response to the team's recent injury bug — one that has bitten defenders Colleen Wales and Shalee Merkle, and midfielders Stephanie Pavlick and Sara MacNabb.

While drawing defensive assignments like Hofstra speedster Heather Kain, Miele has adapted her game to become a threat on offense as well — a side of the ball that the Drexel Hill native was never before relied on for.

Over the course of her freshman and sophomore years, Miele hadn't a single point to her credit. In her breakout junior campaign, however, the defender has made it clear that she can carry an offensive workload, firing the ball past goaltenders in wins against Harvard and Vermont, and being one of only two Minutewomen able to compromise the Syracuse defense while scoring in an 11–2 loss.

With just hope and will–power, Melissa Miele has gone from a mediocre high school to a Division I challenger, and the animal science major doesn't want to stop there.

It would not be a stretch of the imagination to see No. 29 on the field for an amateur club lacrosse team while holding down a career as a veterinarian. Why not? She's worked through more than that.

"I probably will want to [continue playing lacrosse], because I like to play lacrosse," Miele said. "I couldn't imagine not playing lacrosse."

UM women's track brings home 2nd

The Massachusetts women's outdoor track and field team traveled to Hanover, N.H. on Saturday for the official start of its 1999 campaign. The meet played host to a handful of New England rivals in the University of New Hampshire, the University of Vermont, the University of Maine and Ivy League foe Dartmouth College.

When the meet was complete, the Minutewomen left Hanover with a sour taste in their mouths, but with some impressive individual performances. UMass' 56 points gave them a heart–breaking second–place finish, narrowly missing the winner, Dartmouth, which topped the field with 57 points.

The meet also witnessed four different Minutewomen capture individual event titles.

UVM (41 points), UNH (28), and Maine (12) rounded out the meet.

Going into the meet UMass coach Julie LaFreniere was confident that the Minutewomen would fare well in this battle of regional rivals.

"We're coming off an outstanding indoor season and the team is fairly healthy," she said.

The Minutewomen were led by outstanding performances by junior Andrea Comeau and post–grad Rose Bryan. Comeau continued her success in the high jump by placing first with a jump of 1.63 meters. The Reading native also placed second in the 400m in a time of 59.19 seconds, and finished third in the 100m hurdles (15.82 seconds).

Bryan, rounding out a UMass sweep, placed third in the 100m hurdles in a time of 14.62 seconds. The post–grad also placed third in the long jump with a leap of 5.28 meters, and third in the 200m dash with a time of 26.20 seconds.

Ellen encourages students to remain true to themselves

By Mary Miles
Collegian Staff

As part of a benefit attempt to help gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender students cut–off from their parents after coming out of the closet, Ellen DeGeneres spoke last night in the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center.

Ellen, the star of the former show Ellen, came onto stage and responded to the audiences enthusiasm in her typical style, screaming "Right back at ya, baby!" and then started with jokes from her hair color to her sexuality, saying "I have a dream... and in that dream I'm naked in Mexico."

DeGeneres self–explanatory title to her speech, Acceptance Through Laughter, was exactly what she shared with the UMass audience. It was Ellen's ability with comedy that she was able to ease her way into more serious topics.

"From the genocide occurring in Kosovo to the Matthew Shepard case, how can the "civilized world" as we know it be so unaccepting?" Ellen questioned. "How is it that sexism, homophobia, and discrimination in the workplace still exist?"

Ellen spoke of her experiences growing up, and the difficulties she faced without having any queer positive role models. "I never wanted to appeal to a strictly lesbian audience." She expressed her anger with the religious right and "ex–gay" ads which have been broadcast on television, featuring people who used to be gay but have gotten married and joined the religious right.

"We don't take out full page ads of ex–straights. I mean, there would be a whole lot more of them."

Ellen is dissatisfied with the stereotypes many GLBT people face, such as being AIDS carriers. "We don't think all straight males are like Joey Buttafuco," she quipped.

Ellen talked about the reasons she stays in the public eye, despite receiving low–ratings for her show and having it subsequently cancelled. "The only reason to be famous is to help change social consciousness; and I'm sure Fabio would agree," Ellen said.

"I am fighting to be able to love who I want to love, which is nothing special."

A question and answer period followed the lecture, during which students were able to engage Ellen in a dialogue.

Carnell Freeman asked why more celebrities rumored to be gay, like Jodie Foster and Rosie O'Donnell, don't come out, to which Ellen responded "Gimme some liquor and I'll start talking". Apparently no one in the audience had any alcohol, because Ellen later refused to "out" any of her Hollywood friends. Ellen talked about the way that in the media, sometimes gay characters who are played by heterosexuals are more readily accepted than their real life homosexual counterparts.

A high school student came forward and told her that he had a razor in his hand while watching the show, but put it down when she came out. "I can't live without you, Ellen" he said, to which Ellen ran and hugged him.

Ellen sadly remembered the final season of her show as the best, especially the episodes right before the show got cancelled. She gained a lot of confidence after coming out, and her character Ellen Morgan was not as down on herself after coming to terms with her sexuality as she had been previously. "Yes, I have been reading Deepak Chopra and Conversations With God," the comedian said.

When asked how she juggles being true to herself and staying in the public eye, she said that being true to herself comes first.

As the benefit ended, she urged more people to come out of the closet. "Be out," Ellen said, "and be your funny, talented self. Otherwise it will keep getting harder and harder for the rest of us."

Students attempt to remove car; as another kicks car

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

After searching in vain for a parking space in Lot 11 yesterday morning, five University of Massachusetts students took matters into their own hands.

Shortly after 1 a.m., a UMass police officer on foot patrol watched "five suspicious–looking males" push a parked vehicle out of its parking space and through the lot.

According to police reports, the officer observed a vehicle enter the lot and drive around looking for a parking space. The car stopped in the middle of the lot, and the men got out and looked around in all directions. The officer then heard laughing and yelling as the men began to push a parked car out of its space.

After moving the parked car, one student jumped on the hood of another vehicle and began to walk on its roof. The officer heard a loud noise, as if the roof was giving way under the student. The other men applauded.

Two of the five men were arrested: UMass students Luke T. Antolini, 19; and Mike P. Antolmi, 18; both of Melrose. Luke was charged with wanton destruction of property more than $250 and wanton destruction of property less than $250 for walking on top of the second parked vehicle. Police said there were large dents on the hood, scuff marks on the trunk, and large scratches on both the trunk and the roof. Mike's charge was for his involvement in pushing the first parked vehicle. Police said the vehicle had several small dents and a broken driver's side mirror. They also measured a 12–foot–long skid mark on the pavement.

Mike also received an additional charge of disorderly conduct. When he was requested by police to stop for identification, he began to walk away, police reports say. He finally stopped, but began to resist arrest, removing his hands from his head as police attempted to pat him down for weapons.

The amount of damage done to both vehicles is being estimated, and the other three men involved in the incident are being summoned to court.

Another student was arrested on similar charges early Saturday morning, when a UMass police officer observed him kick in a tail light of a car parked in Lot 32 E. south of Massachusetts Avenue.

Adam P. Callahan, 20, of Liverpool, N.Y., was arrested at 1:43 a.m. and charged with disorderly conduct and wanton destruction of property less than $250.

Prospective teachers look into jobs at fair

In a debut attempt to help University of Massachusetts School of Education students network with K–12 regional schools, a job fair was held yesterday in the Student Union ballroom.

Over 150 interested students showed up to meet with representatives from about 25 regional elementary schools who were conducting interviews with students.

The interviews, which were only about 15 minutes long, gave representatives a chance to feel out what prospective school professionals had to offer.

Ron Merritt, a science department chairman from Longmeadow High School, found it to be a "very productive day. We were impressed with the quality of candidates out there."

Merritt, who was interested in filling a physics teacher position at his school, said he found about three qualified candidates who are all female. Merritt said that the present teacher leaving, a female, has been a wonderful role model for the students and he is pleased with the prospect of another female taking her place.

Danielle Pedelaborde, a graduate student with a masters in cultural education and Secondary Teacher Education Programs (STEP) certification in social studies, felt the day was very helpful. "It was my first job fair ever and it was exhausting."

Pedelaborde, who did about four interviews and spoke to about four other representatives throughout the two and a half hour fair, felt it was a "good jump start to the job search."

The fair was sponsored by the Dean for the School of Education, Bailey W. Jackson, the Campus Career Network and the Teacher Education Coordinating Council.

Jackson was impressed with the day's outcome and feels next time a full–day's fair should be planned.

Vice Chancellor Page negates preference on privatization

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

In the midst of a campus–wide debate over the potential privatization of university businesses, Paul Page, vice chancellor for administration and finance, wants to assure University of Massachusetts students, staff, and faculty that the university is open to all possibilities.

"I've heard this issue framed as being a decision that has already been made to privatize these services, and that's not the case," he said. "The process that we are engaged in is to frame the issue so that a decision can be made. There's no pre–conceived outcome. We haven't made a decision to privatize."

In recent weeks, university staff and members from the campus and community have expressed concern that if on– campus businesses such as the University Store and the Textbook Annex are run by private businesses, student jobs would be at risk. Their argument is that at many colleges and universities where businesses have been privatized, work–study positions have been eliminated.

"There may be more jobs (with privatization)," he said. "We don't know."

The issue of privatization has been the subject of controversy ever since two consulting firms, the Cornyn Fasano Group, and Campus Bookstore Consulting Corporation, were hired by the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees to determine whether the efficiency of on– campus businesses would be improved if they were run by private corporations. Many student employees were outraged by the Trustees' decision, and expressed their complaints at several open–forums sponsored by the University.

Page was in helping to oversee the investigation, states that the University is open to the students' concerns. He points to various measures, such as the forums, meetings with campus employees, and the formation of an advisory committee, that have taken student input into account.

"We're trying to bring together all points of view and all information to make an assessment of the effectiveness of these two operations." Page said.

He expects that Chancellor David K. Scott will make the final decision regarding privatization "sometime from mid– to–late May." The original deadline given by the Board of Trustees was May 1, but it was pushed back a month due to what Page calls "the complexity and the work involved."

"This is a heated issue that needs to be put into perspective," he says. "I don't have an opinion one way or the other, and that's something we hope will come out of this process."

NATO attacks despite cease–fire

By George Jah
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic declared a unilateral cease–fire yesterday in his campaign to crush rebels in Kosovo, saying he wanted to honor the Orthodox Easter holiday this weekend. Western leaders called the move a sham and pledged to press ahead with airstrikes.

Moments after the cease–fire took effect at 8 p.m. (2 p.m. EDT), air–raid sirens wailed in Belgrade, heralding new NATO attacks. At least six explosions could be heard late yesterday in the direction of the Batajnica military airport just north of Belgrade and tracer–rounds from anti–aircraft were seen in the night sky. Yugoslav television stations reported further attacks yesterday around the Kosovo capital of Pristina; at Urice, 75 miles southwest of Belgrade; near Kraljevo, 75 miles south of Belgrade; and at Pancevo and Cacak, two industrial towns. U.S. officials say a munitions plant is located at Cacak.

Another missile struck a residential district in Podgorica, capital of the tiny Yugoslav republic Montenegro. There were no injuries but several buildings were damaged, according to Associated Press reporters on the scene.

The Yugoslav cease–fire declaration was clearly aimed at staving off further NATO attacks and at presenting Milosevic's government as a champion of peace.

President Clinton and NATO insisted that half–measures would not end the NATO air campaign that began March 24, and British Prime Minister Tony Blair's office said Milosevic's announced truce "doesn't go nearly far enough."

A rebel spokesman also rejected the cease–fire, which was announced on Belgrade television stations, and said the only way the group would agree to a truce would be if NATO troops enforced it.

The statement also pledged the government would work for the return of ethnic Albanian refugees. However, it wasn't clear if that meant an immediate halt to military actions forcing them to flee.

Russia alone welcomed the cease–fire. "Any peace initiative must be useful," spokesman Dmitry Yakushkin quoted President Boris Yeltsin as saying.

On the refugee front, NATO nations and others rushed in tons of aid yesterday for the 400,000 ethnic Albanians who have been driven out of Kosovo and into poor neighboring states.

Armies of aid workers and soldiers set up row upon row of military tents and latrines for the refugees, while aid flights clogged nearby airports, including the one at Tirana, the capital of Albania. Some doctors were on hand, but the squalid conditions and lack of sanitation left many refugees sick with diarrhea. Conditions were most desperate at frontier enclave at Blace on the Macedonian border, where some refugees have died.

In order to relieve the refugee pressure on Macedonia, Western countries began an airlift to evacuate thousands of refugees from the former Yugoslav republic. Several thousand left on flights late Monday and last night for Norway and Turkey.

Meanwhile, the Clinton administration announced that its naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, would be a temporary "safe haven" for up to 20,000 Kosovar refugees in the coming days.

In its statement, the Yugoslav leadership said the cessation of hostilities against the ethnic Albanian Kosovo Liberation Army in advance of Sunday's Orthodox Easter was a "gesture of good will." Neither the cease–fire declaration nor statements from Yugoslav officials said anything about holding fire against NATO forces, which mounted their most intensive strikes of the two–week–old air campaign late Monday and early yesterday, and promised heavier firepower to come.

Clinton seeks to extend federal hate crime laws

By Sandra Sobieraj
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Hoping to ride the momentum of headlines from Kosovo, Laramie and Jasper, President Clinton asked Congress yesterday to extend federal hate crime laws to include offenses based on sexual orientation, gender or disability.

The United States, Clinton said, is as vulnerable as Kosovo — "old, even primitive hatreds," Clinton said.

"It's very humbling. We should remember that each of us almost wakes up every day with the scales of light and darkness in our own hearts and we've got to keep them in proper balance. And we have to be, in the United States, absolutely resolute about this." The president also ordered the Education Department to begin collecting data on hate crimes on college campuses. "We have significant problems there and we need to shine a light on that," he said without elaborating.

An MTV- Music Television survey released yesterday found that 91 percent of 12 to 24-year-olds describe hate crimes as a "very serious" or "somewhat serious" national problem. Nearly two in 10 young people said they know a victim of a gender-based hate crime.

Overall, more than 8,000 hate crime incidents were reported in the United States in 1997. For 1998, the National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs reported a 108-percent increase in gay-bashing violence that left victims hospitalized. Assaults and attempted assaults with firearms against gays and lesbians rose 71 percent, the report found.

"We're talking about whether people have a right, if they show up and work hard and obey the law and are good citizens, to pursue their lives in dignity free of fear, without fear of being abused," Clinton said.

Current hate crimes law bans only race-, ethnicity- and religion-based crimes. The Hate Crimes Prevention Act of 1999, which Clinton endorsed, would add three protected categories — sexual orientation, gender and disability — and make the prosecution of hate crimes easier by deleting the stipulation that the victim is targeted for engaging in certain federally protected activities, such as serving on a jury, voting or attending public school.

More than 40 states have hate crimes laws but only 21 cover sexual orientation, 22 cover gender and 21 cover disability. Clinton endorsed a partnership among AT&T, Court TV, Cable in the Classroom, the National Middle Schools Association and the Anti-Defamation League working with the Justice and Education departments to develop middle-school curricula to combat intolerance.

Robert H. Knight of the Washington-based Family Research Council denounced it all as a "homosexual agenda."

"We cannot allow the law to designate less protection for some people than others," said Knight. He called the middle-school program an attempt at "reeducating America's children away from traditional morality under the guise of 'tolerance.'"

Many students who study abroad say their life is changed from the cultural experience but for Matthew Burke it is he who did the changing.

After spending a year abroad in France perfecting his French and communication skills, Burke came home and helped bring success to his family's business.

In preparing his family's business, Burke Medical Equipment Inc., for inspection by the Joint Commissions on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations, Burke played an essential role as a lead administrator of the business's survey team. Burke looked over the commissions manual and led inservice training for a staff of about 30, most of which were older than him. Burke also did statistical research in preparation for the commissions inspection for accreditation.

The result of the inspection resulted in Burke's Medical Equipment Inc., owned by Burke's father, was the accreditation of commendation. This is the highest level that can be achieved from the nation's oldest and largest accrediting body and is given to businesses for their dedication to improving the quality of the nation's health care.

Burke's family business is now the only business in Massachusetts that has this joint commission level of accreditation, which Burke said which "is basically like getting the A."

Burke explained that when companies or individuals look to purchase equipment they look for companies with this certification which is like a "seal of approval... in terms of a patient driven organization."

Burke, a senior French major, feels he owes all of his success to his four years at UMass. It opened up his windows of opportunities and allowed for him to experience things he would never have been able to experience had he not chosen to attend UMass.

Burke feels he has helped aid the company to success, but indicates how his trip to France taught him to seek opportunities leading to success.

"One thing to be successful at UMass is to take advantage of every aspect of the University," Burke said. "Don't just come here and take five classes and expect that is going to make you successful and happy."

Burke, has displayed such ideals by choosing to go abroad to France during his junior year. Attending the Institut Catholique de Paris (Catholic Institute of Paris), Burke says he can remember having a close interaction with the professors in small classes which helped him learn to speak French fluently.

"In a smaller class, you're more forced to interact and talk back with them [professors]," Burke said. "You really had to think about what you wanted to say and be prepared to translate it. You either spoke in French or you never spoke at all."

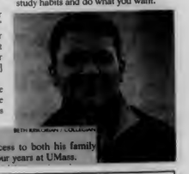
For most students, Burke says, they just go and take classes and then get tested over it, but never really apply it to the real world. Having the opportunity to spend a year abroad in a foreign speaking country was the best way for him to apply what he had learned in the classroom to the real world.

"I think towards the end, in my looking back, what has helped me is going to Paris and then be able to come back here and take classes in French just like in Paris," Burke said.

A resident of Northampton, Burke feels the impression among college students is that they feel they will get lost among such a large university.

"I said you'll get lost here if you spend your first two years here intoxicated in Southwest," Burke said. "I hear people tell me 'I got drunk last night.' I say great. You learned how to get drunk."

Learning from other people's mistakes, Burke has become successful over his years at UMass. Just recently, he was elected into the Phi Beta Kappa Honors Fraternity, an honor given to the top four percent of the senior class. He has also been serving on the UMass Student Judicial Committee, which he says has helped him to become more aware of the student issues surrounding campus.



"It's where everyone gets their fair chance to speak and present the case," Burke said. "You go, you listen to their testimony and the testimony against them and then you decide whether they're responsible for this [allegations] or not."

The best part about serving on the committee is being able to become more involved on campus, and it has been a very positive experience in getting to know the "inside stuff about what happens on campus," Burke said.

Maintaining an active role in the community and being dedicated in his studies, Burke has maintained a 3.8 GPA.

"You need to find your own path through this place," Burke said. "It comes all down to taking advantage of UMass."

After graduation, Burke said he plans to work for the company when he graduates and explains the relevance of his French major as — "I think you just have to have a broad experience, good study habits and do what you want."

UMass alum's documentary awarded an Oscar nomination

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Jonathan Stack, a University of Massachusetts 1979 alumni and director of the Oscar nominated documentary film, The Farm, presented his film in the Campus Center last night and spoke of his experiences learning about the lives of inmates in a state prison.

The movie focuses on the daily lives of convicts at the Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola, otherwise known as "The Farm," and portrays a harsh, but realistic encounter of the injustices occurring in prisons nationwide.

"The U.S. has the largest incarceration rate in the Western world," Stack said. "The bottom line is it reflects a terrible ill in our society."

Stack's film takes a deeper look into the minds of what emotional devestation inmates and their families are dealing with, knowing they will spend the rest of their lives in prison.

"I feel prisons do not address the fundamental problems that are causing crime in the first place," Stack said. "I hope the film causes people to respond and get active about criminal issues within their own community."

Stack utilizes the media of film to further influence people of social issues. He feels that by getting a new idea across to people, it inspires talk and helps people to become more aware of issues. Through awareness, people can take action in support of social issues. Stack thinks that the key in making a good film is honesty, and what that merit carries a positive influence to his viewers.

"That's what film can do best," Stack said. "It brings people together and gets them talking. That's why I love coming back to UMass to show screenings."

Through studying the inmates in the Angola prison, Stack remembers seeing a disturbing moment when a rape convict was denied a parole board hearing without the opportunity to present his case. The decision was made under the pretention that the convict was black.

Such injustices are what energized Stack to get inside the prisons and create the documentary.

"In a life of prison, your worst enemy is anonymity," Stack said. "If you don't get heard or if no one cares, no one will take interest in your case."

He feels the answer to being successful is the art of storytelling. Even in prison, many inmates don't get their stories heard, and thus end up spending their remaining lives behind walls without a purpose.

According to Stack, it is up to each of us to tell our own story the way we want it to be told, and not the way society or the media would tell it. Stack related the storytelling of his own life through his persistance in creating a documentary people would care about. As a result, he feels more focused and energized in creating another documentary with the hope of winning an Oscar.

"Just because we didn't win the Oscar... I don't feel defeated," Stack said. "I feel energized because I'm competitive and I'm motivated like a sports player for the next game."

Three 500–year–old mummies are found intact in Argentina volcano

By Kevin Gray
Associated Press

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — Three 500-year-old Inca mummies, the apparent victims of a ritual sacrifice, have been found frozen and in near-perfect condition on an Andean volcano peak in northern Argentina.

Dr. Johan Reinhard said yesterday that the exceptionally well-preserved remains of two boys and a girl found last month atop the 22,000-foot Mount Llullaillaco near Argentina's border with Chile may offer scientists a rare opportunity to conduct DNA testing on centuries-old bodies.

The mummies apparently contain frozen blood in their heart and lungs, which could reveal ground-breaking clues about diet, disease and conditions during the time of the Incas, the U.S. archaeologist said.

Speaking with The Associated Press, he said the mummies had to be removed from under nearly six feet of dry rock and earth from a burial platform.

Reinhard said two of the mummies were wrapped in intricately woven textiles, but an exact cause of death was not immediately clear. He said CAT scans of the mumnies showed all of their internal organs were intact.

"These bodies were frozen, as opposed to past bodies which were freeze-dried," said Reinhard, speaking in an interview from Salta, a northern Argentine city near the site. "They are very lifelike."

"I expect that when we unwrap them, we will even be able to see the expressions on their faces," he said. "The arms looked perfect, even down to the peach fuzz hairs, and the CAT scans have shown that even the kidneys are intact."

Scientists said the burial platform also held offerings to the Inca gods, including 35 gold, silver and shell statues. Also recovered were ornate woven and embroidered textiles, moccasins and pottery, some still containing food.

"Almost all of the statues are in a state of perfect preservation, including lids on the pottery and even food offerings of meat jerky," said Reinhard.

The expeditionary force that recovered the mummies included American, Argentine and Peruvian researchers who had to brave sometimes extreme conditions such as snowstorms and high winds. A grant from the National Geographic Society partially funded the dig.

Reinhard's crew needed 12 days at the volcano's peak to recover the bodies.

Reinhard said he decided to search the area because he had read that Inca ruins had been found on Mount Llullaillaco, which he had climbed several times since 1980.

Cancer patient report reveals the need for a national system

By Lauren Neergaard
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Eight million Americans require some form of cancer care each year, but too many are not getting the best treatment, says a report issued yesterday that suggests creation of a national system to assess the quality of cancer care.

"We were all shocked at how little information is available on that topic," said Dr. Joseph Simone of the University of Utah, co-author of the National Cancer Policy Board report.

Until there is a system to help patients assess whether they're getting optimal care, the report offered some general advice:

— There are no data on whether most cancer patients should go to a high-volume cancer center instead of a smaller hospital near home. But for complicated and high-risk surgeries, such as for pancreatic cancer or the removal of the esophagus or pelvic organs, and for complicated chemotherapy regimens, patients should seek out hospitals that perform the highest numbers of such procedures. Post-surgical mortality for those complex cases can be two to three times higher at hospitals that treat only a few such patients a year. Yet the National Cancer Policy Board report found that between one-quarter and one-half of surgeries for pancreatic cancer, one of the disease's deadliest forms, are performed at inexperienced hospitals.

— All patients should find oncologists experienced in their particular form and stage of cancer. A woman with Stage III breast cancer, for instance, should specifically ask how many Stage III breast cancer patients the doctor has treated.

— Patients should be given all treatment options before planning a clear approach to therapy. A single doctor should then coordinate and interpret the care patients will need from multiple physicians. It's typical to get radiation at one site, tests at another, for example.

The National Cancer Policy Board was created by the Institute of Medicine and the National Research Council, independent organizations that advise the government. Yesterday's report lays out the problem, and the board will meet later this year to plan solutions with agencies like the National Cancer Institute. "This is a complex and probably formidable task, but we intend to pursue this with vigor," said Simone.

Cuts like a knife

I think that the time has come to tackle one of the more difficult debates facing the United States today: circumcision. As "big people," we sometimes forget about the most pressing issues facing the "little people" in society — sorry midgets and munchkins, I don't mean you, although your rights are definitely worth considering.

It's high time that UMass students take a stand on this important issue. After all, we too were once little, and perhaps some of us may soon have little ones of our own. As big people we become so mired in campus issues that we forget about the pressing concerns of others in society. The voice of infants has been lost on this campus, except for those people who are still whining about long lines at Whitmore. Hence, my mission is to bring important issues such as this to campus.

When did I first start to consider the issue of circumcision? When I was home at some point in the past few months 20/20 did a special on the topic. My dad was watching 20/20 as dads are apt to do, and I happened to be watching it with him while I waited for my friend to pick me up. When my friend — we'll call him Fred to protect the innocent and the guilty — came to pick me up, Dad and I were engrossed in the circumcision story. Apparently parents and parents–to–be are pissed about this issue. Images of angry protestors flashed across the screen.

Alexis Pushkar

"Golly," I thought. There was more to being a parent than I had originally imagined. Circumcision was now added to my list of potential things to fret about. I will have to make decisions regarding car seats, and whether I will use cloth or disposable diapers. I guess I will have to decide whether or not I want my son to be circumcised.

If I have him circumcised he might hate me and I might hate myself. If I don't have him circumcised, he might get some horrible urinary tract infection or perhaps when he is much, much, much older, he might more easily contract an STD. Gasp!

Added to this moral dilemma, there is an aesthetic dilemma. Which style of skin arrangement really looks better? In this shallow world in which we live, I cannot underestimate the importance of looking good. What if my son's wife rejects him on their wedding night because she finds him unattractive in that area? Ah, the horror of it all.

The numbers of males who are circumcised are still substantial in the U.S., but they have been declining in recent years. In 1980, about 80 percent of males were circumcised, but today the number is around 60 percent.

Countries other than the U.S. circumcise their men much less frequently and instead circumcise the women. Fortunately for me, female circumcision will never be popular in the U.S. mostly because the memories of Lorena Bobbit are still too fresh in men's minds; I can't see people like Hillary Clinton being circumcised without doing some extensive circumcising of her own. However, immigrants from Africa and the Middle East think female circumcision is a good idea, and their beliefs often clash with U.S. laws.

Males have been circumcised in America since the 19th century. The process was part of the routine of having male babies by the 1950s, mostly due to the fact that women were having babies in the hospital. Doctors thought that it was a good idea because they believed that the foreskin contributed to STDs and urinary tract infections.

However, in March, the American Academy of Pediatrics published the results of the analysis of 40 years of medical research and they concluded that they can't really justify doing it. If the procedure is performed, "it is essential that pain relief be provided."

The concept of infant pain is part of the backlash against circumcision. Apparently, when the foreskin is stretched out, it has an area of 15 square inches and there are 240 feet of nerves in those mere 15 square inches... yeah, that might hurt a little.

Never fear, baby boys, your rights are being protected by such groups as the National Organization to Halt the Abuse of Routine Mutilation of Males (NOHARMM) and the National Organization of Circumcision Resource Centers (NOCIRC). The NOCIRC thinks that the foreskin actually protects the organ from injury and unwanted stimulation from diapers and zippers. Tell that to the guy in There's Something About Mary... he wasn't too happy.

And neither are 69 of the 313 men surveyed by NOHARMM. Apparently they aren't pleased with their skinless status. So men, if you are unhappy with your skinless status, we'll make a support group for you here on campus. And for those of you who have the skin, you need a support group too, because you are pretty much in the minority for our generation at least. But if the trends continue, you can bond with your sons over something besides fishing.

My other plans for bringing this issue to campus include having a rally on the steps of the Student Union. I've asked the Weinermobile to come back and provide refreshments. After we eat, we can march to Whitmore and bring the employees who work there some hot dogs for lunch.

Alexis Pushkar is a Collegian columnist.

Back in the day

There I was, in a true quandary. My ongoing attempt to emulate Britney Spears had come to a screeching halt.

I was nearly perfect. I had the pleated skirt, knee highs, midriff–baring shirt and my hair up in two perky little braids that hung down along my rosy pink cheeks. What could be wrong in such a seemingly perfect situation, one might ask?

I didn't have the fluffy pink hair bands, of course.

Like, I could have died! So, naturally, being the naughty little schoolgirl at heart, I said, "To hell with classes, get me to the mall."

I stood in the trendy accessories boutique; walls of ball chain necklaces towered over me. I was deciding between the N'Sync lip gloss and the 98_ nail polish. The clerk was approaching me.

Elsa Allen

"Can I help you?" Her mouth was moving in slow motion, the words sounded as though they were being played in rewind on a tape deck. I couldn't respond, my mouth went dry, I began to sweat...

I woke up, tossing in my sheets, the sweat pouring from my brow. Thank God, I thought to myself, it had only been a dream. A terrifying, scream inducing nightmare, actually, but not real, none the less. I got up to check myself in the mirror. No braids, no pleated skirt, no midriff. Nope, it was just me in my torn flannel pants, matted hair and stained t– shirt. I've never loved the look so much in my life.

I thought to myself, "the nightmare must have been a result of my recent trip to the mall," a trip which yielded scores of information that I never wanted to know about today's youth culture. In fact, that simple shopping trip left me scarred and nervous as to where our future generations were headed.

It was an innocent Thursday afternoon when my step– brother Eric and I decided to head down Route 91 to the Holyoke Mall. True, I had skipped class, but Britney Spears was the farthest thing from my mind as I scoped out Nitne West for a new pair of sandals.

While I surveyed the store in search of my shoes, I suddenly got hit with the feeling that I was four years late for the prom. Young kids were travelling in packs throughout the mall, silently stalking unassuming shoppers, laughing and mocking us because we don't shop at Hot Topic.

Three girls stood, leaning over the rail, calling to some boys on the level below. From my observation of their size and demeanor, I would have assumed that they were about thirteen or fourteen years of age. I thought back to when I was thirteen, and the fact that my favorite outfit consisted of a matching skirt and sweatshirt set that had cute little kittens painted all over it. My eyes traveled up and down the length of these girls. Knee–high patent leather boots, leopard print mini–skirts, tube tops, more mascara than Tammy Faye Baker and mouths that spewed forth language the likes of which would make Andrew Dice Clay grimace. I turned to Eric and the only words that I could mutter were:

"Their mothers let them go out like that? They look like cheap Hollywood Boulevard hookers."

Kids these days, sheesh!

Now, I have never been what one would call a "mallrat." Sure, I enjoy shopping, but hanging out at the mall never really did it for me.

One time, when I was thirteen and living in California, there was a major earthquake while I was waiting in Ann Taylor with my mother. You might remember it as the earthquake that stopped the World Series and collapsed freeways and stuff. I remember it as the earthquake. I spent crammed into the dressing room doorway as I watched the hangers swing precariously on the racks and the shoes fall to the floor with light thuds. Not very life threatening, I know, but traumatic nonetheless. It took me years before I could go back into Ann Taylor again. Anyway, that's as far as hanging out in malls has gotten me.

Maybe the group of kids who looked like they had just hopped off the Abercrombie bandwagon to grab an Orange Julius could have been of some assistance, had I asked them why they chose to hang out at the mall. As it was, they were too busy acting like a walking Gap commercial to talk to me. I could have gained more insight by reading the liner notes on the Backstreet Boys album. As they moved past me I noted that they were all wearing the latest in surf inspired clothing. How practical, I thought, out here in Western Mass., to own a pair of shorts that would conveniently double as a swim suit. I think I'll pick some up. I was beginning to understand the mall culture.

Looking back, what I can deduce from the whole experience is this. The mall is no place for old people such as myself. If you are over the age of eighteen you should now be doing all of your shopping over the Internet. Unless, of course, you want to play Keno, which you can now do at the mall. Then, by all means, drag your monkey ass down to the food court and gamble away all that hard earned dough.

As for myself, I picked up a few helpful hints at the mall, you know, to help me retain that youthful appearance. I picked up some vinyl pants at Hot Topic, grabbed the New Radicals CD at RecordTown (you know, the video that takes place in a mall?) and donned a head full of tiny butterfly clips. Now I'm ready, for what, I'm not quite sure. At least if there's an earthquake, I'll be easy to spot In the wreckage.

Letters to the Editor

Great show coming to the Blue Wall

To the editor:

This Friday, Sadasha is playing at the Blue Wall before the showing of "Saving Private Ryan." I want to let people know how important this show is. Sadasha and I have been working with the Veteran's Education Project, a veteran's group dedicated to sharing their experiences with young people in hopes of shedding light on the long–term effects of violence. We have worked with troubled teens in Holyoke with the Vet's Ed Project using Sadasha's music and our stories of surviving as young women in a violent world.

Sadasha is playing on Friday, partially as a tribute to her grandfather who fought In World War II, including the D-Day battle on Normandy Beach. Her music includes powerful lyrics about all kinds of issues, including one song in particular about the long–lasting effects of war on the soldiers and their loved ones. Sadasha's music is both thought provoking and beautiful; it is well worth the walk to the Blue Wall. I thought this would be a good way to let people know about a show that is so much more than just a show.

I'm sure you'll enjoy it as much as I do, so come to the Blue Wall at 8:00 p.m. on Friday, April 9 for a marvelous prelude to "Saving Private Ryan."

Oppression vs. racism

As a member of the class of 1998 at Boston Latin School, I am well aware of both sides of the issue that is being debated throughout the state regarding the use of race as a criterion for admission into a public educational institution. After reading the articles that have so far been published in many newspapers, I can't help but think that pitiful thoughts regarding the naivety of some of the authors and probably of many people who have opinions regarding the issue at hand.

We live in a country where race is a sociological reality and where being the wrong race automatically puts you into a position from which advancement may be incredibly difficult if not impossible. If you compare the educational quality between a school in Newton which is a rich town with that of an inner city high school, you will realize why there is a quota and why there must be a quota in order to sustain the valuable ideal that is diversity.

First of all, the most important factor in this entire debate Is the maintenance of a diverse community. There is a reason why such a goal is being held and that reason is to achieve what this country has failed to recognize as a responsibility even though it is written in the Pledge of Allegiance and in countless other legal documents.

David Wei Liu

The part where you say, "and justice for all" has the word "all" being manipulated to a point suggesting that people of non-European ethnicity are considered less than capable. If we do give justice for all then that would mean equal opportunity which means that because there is little work done to fix the root of the problem in inner cities, we must support "the" statement by bending the rules at the stem of the problem with quotas. It's one or the other. In our school's case, we have abandoned both which means that we are not truly sympathetic to the cause of diversity.

Think of it like this. What if you were born into a poor family where the best education you could attain came from an unaccredited pathetic excuse for a high school and you were wtote all of two papers. Your dream since childhood has been to become a doctor, which requires going to college and then medical school. The University of Massachusetts along with all other higher education institutions that you could afford applying to rejected your application because you just don't compare to the low–ranked high–Income white student from the town of Harvard. Do you think it's fair?

Don't get me wrong, I don't completely agree with our present version of affirmative action; however, I don't like the idea of throwing it away because of its unjust immoral implications. What I am saying is that the system we have now simply vents of an an idea that disturbs most minorities and it is as it follows. When you see someone of a race, and that race is a beneficiary of a racial quota, you will automatically presume that this person is here because of that quota, demeaning his intelligence and downgrading all the minorities involved, thus destroying the goal that diversity is trying to accomplish.

Racism is denying someone admission on the basis of race. Oppression is denying a group of people by limiting them to a certain level of "low life" and then not giving them the opportunity to leave that "low life." The sad thing about this entire debate is that the "majority" hardly see it this way. They see it as if they are the victim and that the minorities are just being handed seats because of their skin color. It just makes me sad to know that these students went through high school without realizing their gift and when they come to college, see what they don't know, and incriminate it.

If you walk by me and take notice of me you might presume that I am an ESL (English as a Second Language) student and have little English ability. After all, I am Asian. You might also presume that I am in March 253 and a computer science major. What diversity is trying to accomplish is simple. It's trying to suggest that race is not at all significant when it comes to classifying a person. It's trying to suggest that I am capable of writing good English, doing average if not less than so in math and not majoring in Latin. It's trying to suggest that everyone is capable of anything and that having a different skin color simply means melanin count.

Latin School has given me what most other schools can not offer. Other than giving me a top-notch education; it has taught me the ideal of diversity through experience and when that has gone through you, the idea of race being a measure of worth is just ridiculous and you see people for who they truly are.

I am not a sociology major or an expert on the issue but as far as I am concerned this entire issue has one morally permissible answer and as unfair as this may be for some people, it' is right. The benefit of the greater objective, outweighs the benefit of the obvious subjective. Yes, it is racist to implement a racial quota but it is oppressive to not do so. Oppression is more racist than a quota can ever be. You must see this issue from all sides to understand why there are two sides and not hide behind the blanket of security that is handed to you.

Best of intentions

Kosovo. The word and the state have been the most important things in the news in recent times. Essentially, NATO is using force to make a point. The point we are trying for is that the ethnic Albanians who live in Kosovo deserve to live within the country. Unfortunately, our bombs have yet to improve the conditions of the Albanians who we are fighting for.

Chris Collins

In fact, the bombing has only increased the strife that these people have in their lives. The leaders of the government have begun to increase the ethnic cleansing that began the conflict. Also, NATO has planned to move refugees from the countries that border Serbia. In other words, they are, in a way, giving up on the idea of making the country safe for the ethnic Albanians in Kosovo.

So, why are we still actively attacking Serbia? If we are able to save lives by evacuation, then why don't we simply save the lives, and find a place to put them. Yes, it would be a difficult thing to do, but if it saves lives and is possible, then why not? Chances are, if we did manage to make this work, it would be cheaper than tossing a great number of one million dollar cruise missiles.

" I think we should realize that our own security is not necessary linked in any great way to Kosovo."

OK, the why is not an easy question. In fact, none of the questions involved in any war are easy. Perhaps the United States (which is, let's be honest, the driving force behind these attacks) is afraid of losing face by leaving a conflict before it has accomplished all its "objectives." This reason, although, it is arguable that withdrawing now would cause a degree of "losing face," is truly invalid because military power is no longer the controlling force in our world. Economic power and diplomatic ability are and probably will continue to be the most important controlling factors in international relations.

For those who doubt this, look at China and how it was able to take Tibet without any major problem. We have yet to intervene there, not because the United States fears the military might of the Chinese, but because our economic system relies too heavily on China to allow our diplomats any real leverage in dealing with the Chinese who realize this fact and capitalize on it.

So our military's loss of face should not be considered in our decision to fight or not. In fact, our decision to fight should be based on two things: how much risk the action is to our troops, and how immediate a threat to our country It is. At the present time, our troops are in a position that is not terribly dangerous, but as is shown by the fact that three of them were captured, there is a degree of danger involved. And with the addition of lower flying helicopters, the chances of something happening is only going to increase.

Working from the second principle, I think we should realize that our own security is not necessary linked in any great way to Kosovo. Yes, the racism sickens me. Yes, it is a terrible situation. Yes, something should be done about it. Should one country be responsible for these actions? No. The citizens of the United States should not feel that they need to intervene; instead I would think that a truly neutral force would be more effective for dealing with the problem. As it is, the United States is spending its money to help a state which it should not have to.

Thus, I think that it is necessary that we work towards setting up an international system that will, in the future, keep the United States from being in the position where it sees itself as having the only solution to the problems that occur in the world. As it is, the United States is not detached enough from the outcome of the situation to truly be wise and careful in the way that it deals with everything because its interests are at risk. A truly neutral body would be able to deal with the problem more efficiently and without the inherent prejudice that exists when any country or group of countries acts even with the best of intentions.

A life and death decision

Should the death penalty be accepted? The Massachusetts House voted "no" on Monday, March 29. The seven–hour emotional debate came to a close with a vote of 80–73, a defeat for Governor Paul Cellucci. When the next legislative session begins in 2000, this subject may be touched upon again, but not until then.

"The chief reason area legislators gave for the bill's defeat was that the vote came at a time when there was no horrific, high profile Massachusetts murders in the news," reported the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Last year, the murder of Jeffrey Curley of Cambridge influenced the vote so that it ended in a tie: 80–80. State Rep. Nancy Flavin voted for the death penalty last year, but was against it this year. Last year she was pressured for her vote for the death penalty by the Curley family with two phone calls. She said that no matter how you vote, you can't feel good about it.

According to the Gazette, there was no chance for the death penalty to pass. Voters were mainly going through the motions. Too much time has been spent on it already. California's Supreme Court spends 50 percent of it's time on it, while Florida's Supreme Court spends 80 percent of it's time on it. For something that has no chance of passing, we've wasted a lot of time discussing it. Spending 50 percent of Massachusetts Supreme Court's time on the death penalty is crazy. We can't afford that, both timely and economically. If something has no chance of passing, we should focus our energy on something else, like making our trial process faster and better (a whole other article).

Emily Vacanti

Unfortunately, this negatively affects Cellucci. This was one of his 1998 campaign pledges to reinstate the death penalty. His strategy of offering a bill that was broader and not narrower was not very smart. He had put so much time into this that he should have cut the bill down. His involvement in this issue was major. Cellucci was very connected to this in personal ways. For him it was more of his defeat than the bill's. The Gazette reports that Cellucci has no one to blame but himself.

The debate seemed to have been dragged out. The few Republicans who were for the death penalty wanted to give up after four hours. By that time, people apparently were looking at their watches, as if to say, "This has gone on for long enough," though House Majority leader William P. Nagle disagrees. He presided over much of the proceedings and doesn't think that the Republicans gave up without a fight. If the vote would have come out differently, it still would not have been referred to as anti–climactic. The question would have been what he did wrong. Nagle was surprised at some of the attempts that the Republicans made. Apparently they offered a half–dozen or so amendments.

Unfortunately for the Republicans, none of the amendments passed. He felt that the vote and proceedings were anything but business as usual. "Legislators credit him with helping to line up the votes and engineer the death penalty's defeat," reported the Gazette. In Nagle's mind, this is the most important vote that the Legislature will take in this two–year session. Nagle said that proceedings have never been anti–climatic.

Nagle had interesting reasons for not wanting the death penalty to be passed. He attends Catholic mass every day and considers the death penalty like crucifixion. "Jesus Christ was unjustly crucified during Holy Week, which is going on now," Nagle told the Gazette. The majority of those that the death penalty is applied to are the minorities and the poor. This is mainly why Nagle doesn't support it.

I feel that the death penalty is a good idea for murderers, rapists, and child molesters. But too often, you do not know for sure if the accused is guilty. And we can't kill innocent people because we "think" that they might be guilty. We have reason beyond a reasonable doubt to just convict someone. We need to be completely sure — life and death sure — before we sentence anyone with death. Also, we can't just sentence them because the family of the victim wants someone to pay, for justice to be served. So the death penalty should not be reinstated. Let God do the final judging; he's the one who knows the whole truth and sees everything.

OUR CHILDREN'S GOLDEN YEARS...

Going who's way?

Okay, now maybe I'm wrong, but I really think that buses should run on weekends. First of all, for those of us that are not fortunate enough to have cars, getting around on weekends is a pain in the butt. Before you call me lazy, (and okay, fine, I'm lazy) let me explain.

After sitting on a bus from New York for five hours trying to get back from Spring Break, my whole body was numb. I could barely walk, let alone get myself from Haigis Mall up Orchard Hill. To complicate things, I was carrying a suitcase, a large duffel bag, and my backpack, all stuffed to the gills, because I had done a little shopping over Spring Break and was taking home more stuff than I left with. Don't ask me how, but by some miracle, I managed to get myself from Haigis Mall to the bottom of the hill by the Franklin D.C. By then, the asthma had kicked in, so I was gasping for air and clutching my chest, as it felt like my heart was about to explode.

Erin O'Brien

Now, maybe I am just getting out of shape, but you have to admit that it would be challenging to walk from the Haigis Mall up the hill with three heavy bags. Luckily for me, a random stranger came up behind me right before I passed out and asked if I needed help. I would like to take this time to thank that random stranger, whose name I didn't catch. I think you know who you are.

But anyway, I survived my journey up the hill, but just barely, and had it not been for the kindness of "random stranger," I might have died.

Okay, maybe not. But I think that this is an obvious reason why the campus shuttle should run on weekends. For people like me athletically–challenged non–drivers who need to get their stuff up the hill after a weekend at home.

Not convinced? Well, explain to me how a vehicularly– challenged individual is supposed to go grocery shopping on a weekend? I should probably preface this little anecdote by saying that trying to go grocery shopping without a car is probably one of the dumbest things I've ever done. But my friend — who shall remain nameless for her own protection — was convinced that we could take the Hampshire Mall bus to Stop & Shop, then make it back up the hill with our groceries; no problem! This plan was flawed from the start because the bus stop is on the wrong side of Route 9.

Let me tell you, it's tough to run across the highway with three heavy grocery bags in your hands. (Someone out there is probably thinking... hey, I saw those two chicks! They sure looked silly!) Regardless, by the time we got across the street and to the bus stop, we both had blisters all over our hands from carrying those heavy grocery bags, and the bus had the nerve to be full when it pulled up to get us.

Fifteen minutes later, the scene was not unlike that of the previous night: there we were, two silly little girls with five bags and a gallon of milk between us, and the whole hill to climb. And again, we got some looks as we trudged our way up the hill, but this time, I was sort of upset by that.

Anyway, two girls, five bags, a gallon of milk, and a hill. Not a good combination. Luckily, random stranger number two appeared behind us and asked if we needed help. First of all, wow! Twice in less than a week! I'm told that I just have that "come help me" look. I don't know how true that is, but I would like to take this opportunity to thank Anna, (a.k.a. random stranger number two), for helping us carry our groceries up the hill.

I should probably point out that we are all not so blessed. Many of you lack cars and do not have "the look," and are therefore forced to carry large amounts of stuff up the hill at various times by yourselves without the aid of a random stranger or a bus. This is why busses need to run on weekends.

I also know that there are plenty of kids who go to the frats on Saturday nights and do not leave them with all of their marbles. I'm thinking that not only would it be more convenient for the partiers to take a bus back to their dorms, but It would be safer as well. Those that have had a little too much fun should not be driving anyway, so busses running to the dorms would keep at least a few people from driving drunk.

Now, I realize that there are reasons why the buses do not run. First, finding drivers who want to work on weekends is tricky. But I have a plan (Music from "Pinky and the Brain" goes here). I personally would not mind paying a small fee if it meant saving me from passing out. And I have other car–deprived friends who agree with me. If we each paid something like fifty cents on weekends to ride the campus shuttle, the extra money could be used to pay the drivers a little extra as an incentive to work on weekends. And you wouldn't even have to have all the busses running. Just one or two busses that went around campus with stops at each residence area would do the job. Not only would it be better for those of us who do not have cars, but it also keeps drunk drivers off the roads.

In all seriousness, I think that this at least merits looking in to. This is a big campus and it is difficult to get around sometimes without a bus. For those of you who are baffled by my idea, I'm sorry that I am not a recluse who hides in my room all weekend, unlike some people (Have you ever been on campus on a Sunday morning? It's really scary. Like "The Stand"). Busses running throughout campus on weekends would make all of our lives easier and safer.

But until then, if you see someone struggling up the hill with an absurd amount of stuff, please help!

Grounds for complaint

Ahh, Spring is in the air. I love spring. Sunglasses, shorts, sun, warmth, tank tops, 40 oz.'s of Colt 45, flowers, and did I mention tank tops? I even saw Chancellor Scott jumping out of an '89 Honda the other day in shorts and dress shoes.

Anyway, it is finally spring. I can tell It is spring because all those damn tree hugging hippies are outside my building beating their bongo drums and throwing their Frisbees while listening to Phish. I hate Phish. Hey, I heard a nasty rumor that Chancellor Scott was going to cut back funding by giving you all tents instead of dorm rooms. And ladies, try shaving your legs. I don't want to see that. That is almost as ugly as our campus.

Matt Frascella

Spring makes its presence felt on campus when the big street sweepers and the army of UMass lawn staff decide that it is time to clean the winter grudge off our lovely landscape. They spend hours sweeping and raking and smoking. They work so hard that they accumulate all the trash into neat little dirt trails all over campus and contract lung cancer.

Then something strange happens: they leave the piles there. Right in the middle of every sidewalk for me to walk through and the wind and rain to blow right back where it was. This spring I watched some workers rake and sweep this large hillside. It looked spiffy and clean, and for a second I thought I had taken a wrong turn and was on Amherst College's campus. Then they brought over some unmelted snow and watched it melt down the hill carrying all the crap right back onto the sidewalk. I was amazed.

I don't understand. If they are going to go through all the effort of sweeping up our campus, why not dispose of the trash?

That of course would be too logical. If they swept it up and were efficient workers then what would they do tomorrow? Nothing. And if there is no work to be done then they would lose their jobs. No jobs means no cigarettes and no trips to Anthony's fine adult establishment. The UMass grounds crew apparently doesn't want to find itself collecting unemployment like UMass faculty.

Instead of Sisyphus boldly fighting the forces of nature that dare soil our lovely campus, they never come back to finish cleaning and their work is wasted. Wasted like Chancellor Scott at a social function.

I look around our campus and I wonder if we even have a landscaping staff. I see them just once a year. I see President Bulger on this campus more often than that. They are like the groundhog, coming out to see its shadow to signify the end of winter then lazily going back to sleep.

UMass staff marks the beginning of spring by their idiotic piles of leaves, sticks, sand and dirt, and their tell-tale stench of Marlboro lights. Most of the time I see those hillbillies just standing there checking out the college girls. That's my Job Billy Joe, so watch it.

Why even try to clean the campus? Honestly, underneath is worse than the leaves. Most schools have green grass and beautiful flowers. Here we have dirt and clumps of weeds. I think we actually take pride in our weeds. We should take a nice picture of the dirt and weeds for the admissions application.

We could use this motto: "Most schools have lawns. We have crap. Come to UMass, we're different and diverse."

Mowing the lawn consists of spray painting the dirt green. It is an old trick Chancellor Scott picked up in the hood.

Just take one good look at our campus pond. The water is greener than the weeds and the spray–painted grass, I don't know how anything lives in that filth. I look into the murky water and I see shopping carts, motor oil canisters, and beer bottles. I am willing to bet their are more syringes in that water than on the Jersey Shore. Damn, that's a lot of syringes.

"Every time I wander by the Chancellor's house there are tons of people cutting the grass and trimming the bushes. He has his brush trimmed more than a porn star."

Still, there are fish swimming in there and it makes you wonder. What the hell is our biology staff doing to those poor fish? I wouldn't go in there if it was full of Swedish bikini models.

Most universities have lawns that are well–maintained to foster pride in the school and make it an attractive living and learning environment. Not here. We settle for dirt and reflecting pools that look like they are imported straight from some condemned urban crack house.

There are two exceptions to this of course. The first is our football field. That team deserves high grass. They are actually good. The second is our beloved Chancellor's house. Every time I wander by the Chancellor's house there are tons of people cutting the grass and trimming the bushes. He has his brush trimmed more than a porn star.

Why is our school in disarray? Why can't we have well– manicured lawns, or sidewalks that aren't cracked and covered in blown–around yard waste? Is it really that much effort to plant grass seed and a few flowers here and there?

Let's clean up our act. I am no tree hugger, but it just makes sense to clean the campus. I don't like the idea that my school has such a complacent attitude towards the grounds. How the hell am I supposed to enjoy spring and all those wonderful 40's and tank tops if I can't even sit on the lawn without having to sweep first? Hey Davey K., keep our lawn as trim as your own.

B.E.T.'S BEST OF PLANET GROOVE
Various Artists
Fully Loaded/Virgin

Planet Groove on BET is a video program featuring slow R&B and soothing voiced VJ's. The lyrics in most of these songs are telling, and soulful; you won't hear any convoluted metaphors, but feelings you can identify with. I defy a listener not to listen to this album without saying "mmmhum- that's right" at least five times. The standouts on the album are Brian McKnight's wonderful, "Anytime." Basically about missing his ex, "Do I ever cross your mind, anytime?" Yeah, I got a little choked up I'm not ashamed to say. Another track that I intensely felt was "Be Careful," by Sparkle featuring R. Kelly. Sparkle, might have a silly name, but she doesn't take any crap. But neither does R. Kelly when he sings back, "who gave you money when your ass was broke without a dime?" What I didn't like about this album was Bone, Thugs, and Harmony — but that's just because their singing reminds me the noise you make when you stub your toe repeatedly. Simply put, if you like popular R&B; get this collection of radio favorites. B+ (Julie Fialkow)

They toured with Iced Earth! This album was produced by the same guy who produces Judas Priest and Queensryche albums! The vocalist, bassist, and guitarist are all from the now defunct 80s metal band Sanctuary! If you understood or are impressed by any of the above facts, then Nevermore's latest album Dreaming Neon Black should be right up your alley. While the press and advertisements for this release all proudly display the aforementioned facts like trophies on the mantle, nowadays it takes a little more to impress. There will always, ALWAYS, be a place for the straightforward 80s metal in the metal scene, but currently there are too many new and creative bands out there to give a band so unoriginal a closer look. Currently, groups are mixing metal with rap (Limp Bizkit, (hed)p.e.), samples and big beats (Pitchshifter), and even Armenian folk tunes (System of a Down), and all of these experiments are working and producing top notch albums. So when bands like Iced Earth, Hammerfall, and yes, even Nevermore insist on pushing a sound that Iron Maiden perfected over a decade ago, it is easy for them to fall through the cracks. Thankfully, Nevermore does have some good things to offer.

First of all, unlike the previously mentioned Iced Earth and Hammerfall, Nevermore's lyrics don't read like a Dungeons and Dragons instruction manual or a written transcript of a magic card game. They are based mostly on insanity, madness, loneliness, and depression, and whether or not that sounds good to you, at least it is different from what their sound and appearance would lead you to believe. Second of all, vocalist Warrel Dane is a far cry from the high-pitched headbanger you might be expecting. His voice is unique and unmistakable, and can adapt to whatever the song may require. As far as the rest of the band goes, none truly stand out: the work of Jim Sheppard on bass, Jeff Loomis and Tim Calvert on lead and rhythm guitar, and Van Williams on drums are all satisfactory. Lastly, the track "Beyond Within" is great and "Poison Godmachine" is a flat-out excellent song in every respect. But as for the rest of the tracks, there are just too many slow and laborious songs to make it worth your while. In the crowded subgenre of metal Nevermore have put themselves, there are many who have done it better before, and even recently the work of Hammerfall is superior musically and just more fun to listen to, saying nothing of the lyrics. Simply put, If you have never heard Nevermore, you wouldn't be missing much. C (Michael Delano)

PELETON
The Delgados
Chemikal Underground/Beggars Banquet

This follow-up to the lovely though somewhat schizophrenic debut that was Domestiques puts a firm foot in the 'worthy music' door for this Scottish foursome. Displaying the vocal talents of both Stewart Henderson and Emma Pollock, each song provides a well-balanced counterpoint to the others. Kicking off with the gentle melody line of "Everything Goes Around the Water," the pleasant string interlude adds a sense of casual thoughtfulness. "The Arcane Model" gives a Pavement-esque lackadaisical jangle, with guitars that schwing and a voice verging on swoon. "The Actress" trips in behind tom-toms with their laces tied together, the guitars shimmering like escapees from a My Bloody Valentine tune. Pollock's voice keeps the song on kilter, with her earthbound version of Hope Sandoval's dulcet tones. The rich, creamy, bass-led calm of "Clarinet" provides a space in which to wander and wonder: the lushness creeping out of this song finds its tendrils extending across the album, but never quite becomes the dominant mood. "Pull the Wires From the Wall" sees The Delgados wandering into that tumblewood strewn ghost- town that OP8 and there ilk have recently given tours of; "Repeat Failure" is a much more noised up affair, breaking for some trippy folk. "Don't Stop" is so laid back it threatens to topple back into the previous song. Slowly, imperceptibly, it loops back around and upon itself, spiralling and growing into a virtual cacophony. It finishes where it began as a reminder to the listener just how much craftsmanship can go into making a pop song. The album highlight is "Blackpool", a morosely drudging, creepy skin producing number. The breakdown in the middle heightens the pain on either side, churning up the murky depths the song dips to.

Overall, Peleton doesn't so much lack focus as have eleven separate and distinct focal points. The exploratory musical meanderings are crafted in the sort of way people will spend two hours brushing their hair to give it that "haven't even touched It" look. Yet for The Delgados, it works. B (Ben Millar)

DREADER DREAD 1976–1978
Johnny Clarke
Blood and Fire Ltd.

The seventies were a remarkable time for reggae music. Bob Marley and the Wailers were gaining international popularity, Jamaican dance hall was ripping through the streets of Kingstown, and Johnny Clarke was pronouncing himself as "Top Ranking." Indeed he was — at least in Jamaica.

'Dreader Dread,' a retrospective of Clake's music during that rhythmically spiritual decade is worth a listen. Clarke combines the lyrical genius of Marley with a soothing tenor voice. His backing band, Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare of Black Uhuru, and Anton "Familyman" Barret and Earl "Chinna" Smith of the Wailers, create a steady and enjoyable world of reggae and dub.

'Dreader Dread' makes me want to move to Jamaica. To put it simply, there is no low point on this album. The recording quality sounds very modern, and the music is timeless. Maybe Johnny Clarke is finally getting the attention he deserves. A (Neale Gay)

SWINGIN' SKA GOES SOUTH OF THE BORDER
Jump With Joey
Will

Won't ska music go away? Haven't I suffered enough?

To be fair though, Jump With Joey plays ska the way it was meant to be played; endless solos from folks who know their stuff. This collection of 12 tracks varies from straight ska, to swing, to mambo... all with an element of pizzazz and style that isn't met by any other band.

This album is straight ahead and the songs often blur from one to the next. The occasional tune has vocals, but the record is mostly devoid of words. In these guys think their horns speak, and in some cases they do. In the song, "Ska Train," I felt like a slick player, downing martinis and smoking Cuban cigars. The problem with that? At the end of the day, I'm hung-over and smell like tobacco.

If you're not a ska fan, you may want to avoid this album. If you are a fan, well, then you probably hate me for not liking Jump With Joey. There is no accounting for taste, yours or mine.

To put It simply, 'Swingin' Ska Goes South of the Border' is a soundtrack for bad music victims. D (N.G.)

IF YOU CAN BELIEVE YOUR EYES AND EARS
The Mama's and the Papa's
MCA

With their blending harmonies, hooking melodies, and wonderfully unique style, The Mama's and the Papa's emerged in the mid-sixties as pop icons. Their dreamy sound contained the voices of Papa's John (the band leader) and Denny and Mama's Cass and Michelle. Their heated off-the- mic relationships made for an interesting and exciting arrangement which ultimately erupted the band in turmoil.

This recently re-released classic, contained well-known hits "California Dreamin'", "Monday Monday", and a cover of the Beatles' "I Call Your Name". If You Can Believe Your Eyes and Ears reached #1 in early 1966 and stayed on the charts for almost two years.

Understandably, If You Can Believe Your Eyes and Ears is considered a landmark in folk-pop music. It's contrasting sounds of bright harmonies and darker musical tones give the album a remarkably silky feel and their lyrics catered to the joys of pop culture in the '60s with themes of happiness, love, and life.

This album misses nowhere and ultimately reaches it's goal of being incredibly catchy and creatively familiar. A- (Eric Krans)

Goldwyn directs a nuanced Walk

By Ted Anthony
Associated Press

A WALK ON THE MOON
with Diane Lane, Liev Schreiber, Anna Paquin
Directed by Tony Goldwyn

The '60s are hurtling toward their end, and Pearl Kantrowitz (Diane Lane), a Jewish housewife from New York City, is feeling a bit penned in. She adores her kids but knows she had them too young. She loves her husband but wonders if he sees who she really is.

A gnawing feeling has taken root in Pearl's belly that life is passing her by and that the world, pushed by the tumult of the age, is moving at dizzying speed: The moon landing and Woodstock are just days away. The times are changing.

Thus the setting for A Walk on the Moon, a nuanced look at life in a Jewish bungalow colony in the late 1960s. The movie has the pace of one of the summers it chronicles, but cuts much deeper with its insights about how people make compromises — and how they cope with their choices.

Pearl, her young son and her adolescent daughter Alison (Anna Paquin, with a flawless American accent), head up to the Catskills for the July holiday; her husband, Marty (Liev Schreiber), a TV repairman, stays behind in the city, furiously fixing televisions for the impending moon landing.

Freed from the confines of her urban apartment, Pearl begins to contemplate what she's been missing. Various sightings of hippies and images of the late 1960s — rock music, tie-dyed T-shirts — pique her interest and send her deeper into her self-review.

Meanwhile, one of the salesmen who passes through the bungalow community where the Kantrowitzes are staying catches her eye. Walker Jerome (Viggo Mortensen), an itinerant blouse hawker who oozes counterculture from every pore, looks at Pearl in a way her husband never did — hungrily, openly. To Pearl, he is a conduit to worlds she has never experienced, and she falls with little resistance.

At the same time, Alison is experiencing sexual stirrings of her own and trying to gauge what they mean. At the onset of puberty, Alison is a walking, talking bunch of emotions and hormones, and she looks to her mother and her paternal grandmother (Tovah Feldshuh, who plays the film's conscience) to help her cope. To say more about the plot itself would be a disservice, since its twists and turns add extraordinary texture to the tale. Suffice it to say that both the moon landing and Woodstock figure prominently in the unraveling of the Kantrowitz family — and in its members' ultimate, desperate attempt to keep their clan from collapsing entirely.

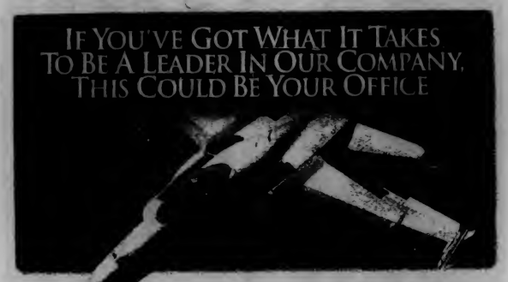
A Walk on the Moon, sort of a Jewish/Catskills answer to the WASP/suburbia film The Ice Storm, is equally devastating in its chronicling of American discontent, especially the female variety. Pearl has love and security, and yet — like so many women of her era — she feels a gap deep inside, a dark spot she cannot define and cannot excise.

She feels that she missed her youth, and she sees a chance at liberation. She dives for it, not seeing — or at least not fully understanding — the damage she will wreak, especially in the eyes of her daughter. The script and the textured sense of place — the Catskills are rendered full of unblemished highways, quiet bungalows and people who derive joy simply by being together — are augmented by a series of wonderful performances.

Lane is just perfect as Pearl. Her every facial twitch, every glance, speaks to her internal conflict. Mortensen makes the ideal seductive hippie (and has in previous roles); his ability to ease from come-hither attractiveness into predatory sexuality is an unsettling as it is compelling.

Paquin, who won an Oscar for her supporting role in the 1993 film The Piano, enters a new phase of her young career, exhibiting the depth and subtlety and roiled emotions so typical of the American girl she isn't in real life. Her first make-out session is under a full moon — a moon populated, for the first time, with human beings.

And Schreiber makes a wonderful Marty, a man with a big heart and a big temper who ultimately must decide to do the right thing, whatever that is.



Peppered with quiet experiences and wonderful small moments ("Guys I can kiss; bacon is a different story," an orthodox girl says to Alison), A Walk on the Moon is a harrowing, attentive and unique look at what the end of the 1960s meant to a small group of people. And in that tale, on a small canvas, is a bit of wisdom for the ages.

Residents get weird on tour

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

THE RESIDENTS
Pearl Street Nightclub
Apr. 4

NORTHAMPTON — I wonder how many people that went to this show knew what they were getting themselves into. Probably none. No matter how big a fan you might be of this band, their unpredictability will prevail.

For those of you unfamiliar with The Residents, they are one of the most prominent bands in the field of "out" rock (extreme avant-garde, out where the buses don't run). They have been around nearly two decades and they have managed to maintain their originality and their anonymity. The names of the band members remain a mystery that is hid behind giant eyeball masks wearing top hats. No one knows who these people are, which is another thing that makes this band so freakin' weird. It can't be known whether these are the same band members from show to show or album to album.

Their stop in Northampton is the second date on their "Wormwood" tour, named for their most recent album, Wormwood, which is a sort of rock opera based on biblical stories. So, it is more than appropriate that they were performing on Easter Sunday.

Their live show is more of a piece of performance art than a rock concert. The sets were striking, the costumes were bizarre, and the lighting washed the stage in saturate colors. The giant eyeball people played the instruments, while the black skull man narrated and the fluorescent-nosed man and woman portrayed all the biblical figures.

The first act told four stories, which included the songs "Mr. Misery," "God's Magic Finger," "Cain & Abel," and "Fire Fall." After a 10 minute intermission, Act II was performed which told the story of four more prominent biblical figures: Abraham, Moses, David, and not Jesus — but Judas, because "where would Jesus be without his Judas." "Kill Him! (Abraham, part II)" "Bridegroom of Blood," "Barihesheba Bathes (David, part II)" and "Judas Saves" were songs performed in the second act.

The freakishness continued with an Epilogue which included the song "Old Time Religion."

The Residents claim that they are not making fun of the Bible with Wormwood, they are merely pointing out that the book that Judeo-Christian morals are based on, also include rape, murder, and incest as prevalent themes.

The Residents are definitely not an act to miss. If you couldn't get out to see them, you seriously missed out on a wonderfully strange experience.

Bringing an inoffensive reception

By Tanya Mannes

LABOUR OF LOVE III
UB40
Virgin

Wedding season will be here soon, and with blushing May brides comes blush-worthy wedding reception music. Where I'm from, no reception is complete without the Chicken Dance— and nobody sits that one out.

Certain songs are just right for tipsy mothers-in-law, cake- smeared grooms, and the odd corny guest to slosh around to. UB40 has consistently provided the requisite upbeat, reggae- inspired tunes that might even bring a little tear to your eye.

In 1983, "Red, Red Wine" was tinkling on the radio, a single from the smash album Labour of Love. Maybe "Can't Help Falling in Love" off Promises and Lies was "your" song back in 1993. No matter what, you will hear them at wedding receptions for decades to come.

Two things have contributed to UB40's ubiquitousness. For one thing, the group recycles neglected songs with flair, capturing their old-style, tight melodies. For another, the band strives to be inoffensive. On the latest release, Labour of Love III, an unwillingness to cause trouble is obvious. Original Wailer member Pete Tosh's petition for legalization of cannabis, "Legalize It," comes off as a dippy little number about, say, jaywalking. The liner notes carefully even avoid mentioning the "weed" by name, using euphemisms such as "a superior alternative to a martini." Could it be a coincidence that "Legalize It" ends with... snoring? This music goes down easy. Sometimes, too easy.

But UB40 is not just wedding reception music, by God! On hot summer nights, you don't want Guinness. You want a lighter drink. Similarly, UB40's reggae-lite satisfies as mellow tunes in their own right.

The most real-sounding reggae tune on Labour of Love III is "Blood and Fire," where the group punches a little energy into the vocals. But by far, UB40's crossover tunes are the most delightful. "Holly Holy" is a groovy take on Neil Diamond's tune. The gentle, lilting "It's My Delight," formerly sung by the Melodians, is charming. "Come Back Darling," sung on the album's debut video, should make the Top 40.

The best on the record: "My Best Girl." Catch-in-your-throat romantic, its sound is vaguely '80s prom. Loved it. I actually can't wait to hear it at the next wedding reception. The album is a crowd-pleaser for UB40, once again. A-batting .351 with 15 RBI this year, and is also second on the team in stolen bases behind leadoff man Shaun Skeffington.

Braunstein, on the other hand, seems to have rediscovered his power stroke again this year. After belting 14 round trippers as a sophomore, the Margate, NJ product hit only three last season. So far in 1999, however, No. 12 has posted a .329 batting average, a team-high 21 RBI, and is tied with Kulak for the team lead in long balls.

CCSU, who has not defeated a team in a major conference yet this season, is led offensively by junior outfielder Rob Baehr. The Marlborough, Conn. native leads the Blue Devils with a .423 average, five homers and 23 RBI. All in all, Baher leads the New Britain, Conn. school in nine different offensive categories.

Senior outfielder Jason Maule is the only other CCSU starter who is batting over .300 this season. Maule sports a .375 average and leads the team with seven stolen bases. Junior second baseman Mike Lombardo and freshman third baseman Billy Thomes are also top threats for the Blue Devils.

The CCSU pitching staff has been anchored by senior hurler Adam Poturnicki, who is 5-1 with a 1.53 ERA in 1999. After Poturnicki, though, things get murky for the Blue Devils. No other pitcher on the staff has an ERA under five. Scott Martin and David Yanosy each have two wins apiece for Central this year.

After today's game, the Minutemen will take to the diamond once again tomorrow when the Huskies of the University of Connecticut visit Amherst. UConn defeated UMass 20-14 last Tuesday in a slugfest in Storrs, Conn.

Sophomore Nick Sklrkanich will look to build on a three- hit shutout he tossed against the University of Hartford last Wednesday when he gets the ball tomorrow against the Huskies.

The UMass homestand will then continue through April 21. The Minutemen will play host to Xavier University (three times), Northeastern University, Temple University (three times) and the University of Vermont.

Stone feels that this homestand could help the Minutemen springboard ahead into the heart of their schedule.

"It's always nice to play at home for an extended period of time," he said. "For a while we've been away from home, and now we need to play at home."

JOSEPH D. SANTICH / COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts baseball team is looking to gain some consistency to its season. Catcher Brian Samela and his teammates have a game today against Central Connecticut.

Boston takes on Royals

Offerman looks to follow up Monday's showing

KANSAS CITY (AP) — Jose Offerman won't make Boston Red Sox fans forget Mo Vaughn any time soon. But Offerman's debut with his new team was a performance to remember.

After going 4-for-5 in Boston's 5-3 win Monday, Offerman will get another chance to victimize his former team when the Red Sox play the Kansas City Royals again tonight after yesterday's day off.

"We advertised him as a professional hitter," Boston general manager Dan Duquette said, "and that's what he is."

Duquette was widely criticized during the offseason for getting nothing in return for slugger Mo Vaughn, who signed as a free agent with Anaheim after hitting .337 with 40 homers last year.

He did sign Offerman and was ripped for the seemingly inflated four-year, $26 million contract given to a player with 22 homers in seven major league seasons.

But Offerman led the AL last season with 13 triples and was fifth with a .403 on-base percentage and 45 stolen bases. And on Monday, he had two singles, a double, a triple, a stolen base and two runs.

Perhaps by the time the Red Sox opened their home season yesterday against the Chicago White Sox, fans have begun to appreciate his ability.

"We are two different players," Offerman said of himself and Vaughn. "It's hard for me to do what he can do."

Late last season and in the playoffs, the bottom of Boston's batting order struggled. The lineup appears more balanced now. Only No. 2 hitter Darren Lewis and No. 9 hitter Trot Nixon failed to contribute to Boston's 15-hit attack Monday.

"Nobody in the clubhouse can replace Mo Vaughn," said Mike Stanley, who took over Vaughn's first-base position. "I've said from the beginning we're all going to have to contribute to make up for Mo."

Kansas City fans, who booed Offerman, will get a chance to do that to another former Royal when Bret Saberhagen gets his first start on the mound tomorrow.

He had shoulder problems late in spring training but should be ready.

Another former Royal, closer Tom Gordon, recorded his first save Monday when he retired all three batters he faced.

"Fortunately, I was able to get them out in the first game of the season, because I did have some jitters," said Gordon, who had 46 saves in 47 opportunities last season.

The Red Sox, though, had unexpected pitching problems at the start when Pedro Martinez, last year's Cy Young award runnerup, allowed two runs.

"He didn't have his best stuff," catcher Scott Hatteberg said. "but he got by on a lot of heart and just will."

Martinez held the Royals scoreless for his other five innings and finished with nine strikeouts while allowing one walk. Derek Lowe allowed an unearned run in two innings before Gordon finished up.

"It's going to be like this," said John Valentin, whose two-run homer tied the game in the third. "We're going to have to claw sometimes. It's going to be a pitching-and-defense-type thing. "If the pitching keeps us close, we'll score some runs."

After college, Rima Putta knew she wanted to go to medical school, but thought she'd be better prepared with a firsthand understanding of how other people lived. With AmeriCorps, Rima was able to travel and work with people in many different communities—from rural towns, to tough urban schools, to neighborhoods hit by floods and other disasters. "AmeriCorps helped prepare me for school," she says, "but the true value was the experience itself."

As a complement to Weltzel, the Big Green has juniors Kate Graw and Emily Fenwick who have collected 14 and 12 points, respectively. These three juniors along with the numerous other players who are on the verge of breaking 10 points this season has resulted in a 12.8 goals per game average for the Big Green offense.

Defensively Dartmouth has been stellar. They have allowed only 7.6 goals per game. If you take away their opening day loss to Maryland, they have only allowed six goals per game in the last four. One of the major reasons for their success defensively has been the play of their freshman goalkeeper Sarah Hughes, who has compiled a 4-1 record, a .614 save percentage and a 7.43 goals against average.

For the Minutewomen, the offense is still a concern. They have been decent overall averaging 9.25 goals per game, but have struggled against ranked opponents scoring just over five goals per game. The Minutewomen have averaged 7.42 goals against per game so they need to bring up their totals on offense to regain the consistency that Coach McClellan talked about the team having at the beginning of the season.

UMass will need to continue to look to their senior co- captains Melissa Anderson and Laura Korutz, who have combined for 21 goals and three assists. Most importantly for the Minutewomen has been the consistency of Anderson, but as for Korutz, she just broke out of a mini-slump by scoring a hat trick against the Flying Dutchwomen of Hofstra. Her continued offensive play will be crucial against Dartmouth.

Other complements include Noelle Gorski who is having a good season with 12 points thus far, and Fay Naber, Rachel Ingraffea and Minaker who have 10, nine and eight points, respectively. But the offense which had been problem-free injury wise is now beginning to suffer as Gorski has been dealing with an injury to her knee since the Hofstra game. Naber will also miss the Dartmouth contest for family reasons.

"With Fay out, everyone else will have to pick up the pieces. We will see some new people in the lineup. But right now we're just looking to enjoy ourselves, and the Hofstra game was a nice building block for us," McClellan said. "But if that means we knock off Dartmouth then great."

The depleted UMass defense has a tough task ahead of them this weekend in trying to contain Dartmouth's offensive guns. The team will likely look to Lynne Young and Melissa Miele who have been two of the more consistent players on defense.

In goal for UMass the situation is still unclear with Jen Nardi posting an impressive .711 save percentage, while Tara Durkin is allowing 7.16 goals per game and has a 3-2 winning record.

"We don't know who will be starting in goal. Durkin suffered a mild concussion in the Hofstra game when she got hit in the head, so we don't know," McClellan said.

This game is huge in terms of the improving their record to 5-3, but it mean so much more if the Minutewomen knock off Dartmouth, in terms of confidence and in terms of getting over the mental obstacle of having not yet beaten a ranked opponent.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Rebecca Minaker (left) will need help from strong bench players like Katie Carey in order to keep the Minutewomen afloat amidst an unusual string of injuries.

worst enemy, committing nine errors in 12 innings.

"I felt we put the ball in play very well today," said Sortino. "If you put the ball in play, you create opportunity. They made a lot of mistakes, and that's why it is so important to put the ball in play."

The impressive home play comes close on the heels of a lackluster road trip which saw the Minutewomen drop a rare conference game. Winning at home seemed to be set in their minds as Henderson set the tone by striking out the side in the top of the first inning.

"I thought we had a lot more intensity, but we needed to," said Sortino. "That was a very difficult day on Sunday. We were a very flat softball team. I think our kids did a great job turning it around, being really intense. I thought it was really important that they took the field, created their own atmosphere and that they had intensity for the game. I was very pleased to see them do that. To me I thought it was the junction as far as where we were going to go this year."

With a decisive performance on both sides of the ball the Massachusetts team reasserted itself and demonstraied that it hopes to be a contender once again this season.

NOTICES

Community — Anyone interested in starting a Track & Field Club, Cross-Country Running Club or both call Leah at 546-2124.

Contest — The Campus Center Student Union Commission is having a T-shirt design contest. The design should show dedication to students and an ability to govern in the Campus Center/Student Union complex with student demands as a principle motivation. It should include "UMass Amherst Campus Center/Student Union Commission" shown clearly, and should express something about a desire to be a better and louder voice for students. For more information call 545-0108. There will be a $50 cash prize for the chosen design.

Exhibit — The Interior Design/Architectural Studies Department will present an exhibition entitled "Material, Space" featuring a diverse range of current student projects at Herter Gallery through April 15.

Information — The Alcohol and Drug Education Program at UHS offers general information, referral, and training workshops in room 248 of University Health Services weekdays from 8:30 a.m.-5 p.m. Call 577-5181 for more details.

Services — Accounting services from the UMass Accounting Department will be working out of the Hampshire Mall. It is free and open to the public, and open on Tuesdays and Thursdays from 4-7 p.m. in the Hampshire Mall community room, and on Wednesdays from 6-9 p.m. on the Hampshire Mall Stage.

FYIs are public service announcements printed daily. To submit an FYI, please send a press release containing all pertinent information, including the name and phone number of the contact person to the Collegian, c/o the Managing Editor by noon the previous day.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You'll be able to look after more than your own duties today, but you must let others act out certain key roles. Share the limelight.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Explanations come easily today, but there may be certain issues that require a bit more investigation if you want to get the whole truth.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Make sure that everything is in the open today. You don't want to find that someone in your camp is secretly plotting against you in some way.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Indecision will not be a major factor today, and yet you may discover that something you rushed into yesterday is not working for you today.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You're going to want to assemble the best possible crew to work with you today on a project that is just getting started.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — What others say about you today is not likely to affect you as much as you may think. How you feel about your own actions is most significant at this time.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You'll want to start slowly today and build step by step to a climax that cannot be ignored. What you have to offer is of great importance.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You needn't fill your head with thoughts of style and image today. Substance is most important. However, try to focus on each detail as best as you can.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Avoid formalities today if you wish, but do not forget your manners when dealing with those in positions of importance and status.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — A straightforward, honest approach is best today, especially when the issues at hand are most sensitive. A co-worker may request your assistance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — The time has come for you to do a good turn for someone who has done you a favor recently. Keep all relationships on firm footing.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You can say much today and it will surely mean a lot, but one or two key messages will have the greatest impact on a certain few who are listening.

Sila should stay; while Knicks need over-haul

Bernie Bickerstaff is the latest casualty in the NBA coaching ranks, the fourth on the season. After securing Mitch Richmond from Sacramento in exchange for Chris Webber, the Wizards felt they were headed to the playoffs after missing the dance by one game last season.

Richmond and point guard Rod Strickland, two contrasting souls if ever there were any, have failed to blend into a cohesive backcourt unit, a partial explanation for Bickerstaff's dismissal.

Sanford Appell on the NBA

After the capital city cager's "big three" of Strick, Richmond and Juwan Howard, team production has been paltry.

Calbert Cheaney is averaging a modest 7.5 points per game, and former sharp shooter Tracy Murray has connected on only 34 percent of his field goal attempts.

Bickerstaff was 77–71 with the Bullets/Wizards, and posts a 338–348 career mark, making him fairly marketable for another coaching position in the near future such as with the Nets or Cavaliers.

Word out of Cleveland is that the "czar of the telestrator", Mike Fratello may bolt the "city by the lake" following this season. The Cavs are struggling at 16–15, without the services of future star Zydrunas Ilgauskas in the pivot.

One interim skipper who should assume a permanent role is Charlotte's Paul Silas. Silas deserved the nod for the Nets post six years ago, but was passed over for (ugh!) Butch Beard.

Despite a recent four-game losing slide, Silas should finally get the benefit the doubt, especially since he is one of the few authority figures ever to motivate Derrick Coleman.

It is almost painful to criticize Rick Pitino, one of the few basketball geniuses currently patrolling the sidelines, but his decision to toss in the towel on Chauncey Billups was a major mishap.

While Pitino was correct in his assumption that Billups is not a point guard by nature, he underestimated his ability to take over a game offensively.

The former Buffaloes guard has flourished in his return to Colorado with the Nuggets, exploding for two 30 point outings over the past week before beating the Clippers with a game-winner on Sunday.

On the season "Chaunce" has averaged 13.4 points and 3.6 assists per contest as the starting shooting guard.

The number three pick in the 1997 draft is a likely Player of the Week selection, with a brighter upside than current Celt Kenny Anderson will ever have.

Anderson still has no concept of how to make the players around him better, essentially the most significant chore of a "one" guard.

The open jumper with 20 seconds left on the shot clock will always look better than the open man under the hoop to the Georgia Tech dropout.

While the majority of the talk in the Big Apple regards the courting of Phil Jackson to replace Diet Coke fanatic Jeff Van Gundy on the bench, GM Ernie Grunfeld is the employee who must really be getting antsy.

His off–season moves have not paid even half the dividends they were intended to. Bringing in Latrell Sprewell is a disaster on its own merit, but if the move was going to be made why hold onto Allan Houston?

Spree speeds up the offense, while Houston slows it down, and in the meantime hobbled Patrick Ewing still thinks he is the go–to guy.

The end result will likely have the Knicks squeaking into the playoffs for a five–day stay and a first round exit.

Moving on to the West, it remains apparent that the Rockets will need to find a veteran guard to give themselves a legitimate shot at knocking out the Lakers and Jazz in the playoffs.

Kevin Johnson is only a phone call away, so get on the horn Houston, and open the bankbook, to bring KJ on board.

Think Don Nelson is still proud that he somehow managed to pry Shawn Bradley away from the Nets?

Bradley, who has finally bulked up to some degree physically, looks as anemic as ever on the hardwood, averaging 8 points and 7 rebounds a game.

Wouldn't be so bad if he didn't have 6 inches on everyone he was matched up against.

In any event, look for Nelson to be axed next along with assistant coach/pride and joy Donnie Nelson.

Game of the Night: Los Angeles Lakers at Sacramento, 10:30 p.m. In California's newest rivalry, the Lakers will be seeking revenge after Webber stunned Hollywood's Finest two weeks ago with a miraculous fadeaway at the horn in the Great Western Forum.

Henderson pitches perfect

RYAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Becky George batted in a run against Central Connecticut yesterday afternoon. That would be all that pitcher Danielle Henderson would need in a perfect game.

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

Nothing less than perfect.

Danielle Henderson showed Central Connecticut why she is one of the best pitchers in college softball by pitching a perfect game in the first game of a double header.

"We had a little rough weekend," said Henderson. "I wanted to pitch a little better and finish it off."

And finish it off she did. Henderson went seven innings sitting down all 21 Blue Devil batters she faced. She struck out 17 as her teammates exploded for seven runs. The perfect game was the second of her impressive collegiate career and the third no hitter in her last four outings.

"Obviously, a perfect game is quite a phenomenal feat," said Coach Elaine Sortino. "It is a very difficult thing to achieve. She had command of all her pitches today. The thing about it was that she could have gone on a steady diet of a rise ball facing this kind of a hitting team, but we worked in a lot of other pitches."

The second game of the double header featured more stellar pitching from the No. 22 Massachusetts squad. Carrie Jefferies had a no hitter going through four innings before Jen Hadley finished off Central Connecticut in the fifth. Hadley surrendered the only hit the Blue Devils would earn on the day. The mercy rule was invoked in the fifth after UMass piled up eight runs.

"I felt that she [Jeffries] did a great job," said Sortino. "It was another solid performance. I thought we had really great pitching from all three of our pitchers today."

Strong pitching combined with run production combined to sink Central Connecticut. In the first game Teri Rooney went 4–for–4 including a triple en route to belting in two runs. Freshman teammate Cherra Wheeler also knocked in two runs and scored another two as the Maroon and White piled up seven runs behind Henderson's pitching.

Wheeler continued to power UMass in the second game. She finished 3–for–3, once again scoring two and driving in two. Wheeler had a double in the second game before belting a one out solo home run over the center field fence.

Throughout the afternoon Central Connecticut seemed to be their own

UM set to host CCSU

Second baseman Shaun Skeffington wings the ball over to Gavin Clark for an out. The UMass baseball team will look for these two to play well against Central Connecticut today.

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

After playing 18 of its first 20 games away from the friendly confines of Earl Lorden Field, the Massachusetts baseball team will open up a 10 game homestand this afternoon at 3 p.m. against Central Connecticut State University.

The Minutemen (10–10) are coming off a weekend in which they dropped two of three games to Atlantic 10 rival Duquesne. The Blue Devils, who will come into today's action with a 10–11–1 mark, lost two of three contests to Northeast Conference rival Fairleigh Dickinson University last weekend.

"I thought that we played OK at times. We could have taken advantage of some leads that we had in the first two games," said Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone about his team's performance against the Dukes. "We got in a couple of close ones."

These two teams have already squared off once this season, dating back to March 20 in Fort Myers, Fla. where UMass dominated CCSU in every aspect of the game, with a 17–0 victory. Seniors Aaron Braunstein and Bryan Mazzaferro, along with freshman Chris Morgan all went 2– for–3 in the game to pace the Minutemen. Senior Brian Samela also added three RBI in the Massachusetts victory.

CCSU has struggled since that contest, losing 10 of 14 games, but Stone knows that his team can't bank on a carbon copy of the first game this time around.

"I don't think that we can assume that we are going to see the same team that we saw in Florida this time around. I think that they are going to be a much better team," he said. "You can't count on beating a team 17–0 every time, and you definitely can't take anything for granted."

UMass will send freshman right–hander Jesse Santos to the mound this afternoon for his first collegiate start. The Chelmsford native, who has been impressive as of late, brings a 1–0 record with one save to the table against the Blue Devils. Opponents are only hitting .172 against Santos, who also sports a 3.72 earned run average.

Offensively, the Minutemen have a plethora of starters who will carry batting averages of over .300 into today's affair. Freshman outfielder Mike Kulak has been the hottest UMass hitter as of late, and leads the team with a .409 mark. The Bristol, Conn. native also is tied for the team–lead with three home runs, and is third on the squad with 15 RBI.

Red–shirt freshman Scott Anderson has also put together an eye–opening campaign thus far. The former Fairfield Prep standout is right behind Kulak with a .394 average, and is also one of the team's top base stealing threats.

Other top offensive contributors include sophomore first baseman Nate Lang, who is hitting .389, and Morgan, who holds a .354 average through the first 20 games of the year.

Seniors Mazzaferro and Braunstein have also been key cogs in the UMass wheel. Mazzaferro is

Minutewomen lacrosse to face Dartmouth today

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts (4–3) women's lacrosse team figured that by the time they played No. 10 Dartmouth College (4–1, 3–0 Ivy League), it would be for position in the rankings. After all, the Minutewomen started the season ranked No. 20, but after losing all three of their games against ranked opponents, the Minutewomen are just looking to get some notoriety back by beating the Big Green when they play today at 4 p.m.

UMass finds itself with some new found momentum after defeating Hofstra 15–10 at Ruth J. Totman Field on Friday afternoon. The team is also playing with some new found confidence. Both Sara MacNabb and Rebecca Minaker spoke of the new found confidence after the Hofstra win, saying that they are looking to convert this momentum into wins.

The Big Green has always been a powerhouse in women's lacrosse, and today's game stands as a huge turning point for the Minutewomen as they start the second half of their regular season.

In last year's contest between Dartmouth and UMass the Big Green came out on top with a 16–7 final at Totman Field. Dartmouth currently holds an 11–8 edge in the series between the two schools.

"We always play well for Dartmouth. It's always competitive and we're just looking for that type of atmosphere," coach Francesca McClellan said.

Dartmouth boasts crushing defeats over Boston College, Columbia, and two ranked opponents, Yale and Brown. The only loss for Dartmouth was to No. 1 Maryland, but that was a loss by 10 to the best team in the land.

The list of players the Minutewomen defense will have to watch includes junior attack Jacque Weltzel who has 20 goals in only five games, with one six goal game. She also boasts eight assists.

"She is a strong player, very talented and we are looking for Lynne Young to mark her up," McClellen said.

Committee to examine Honors College impact

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association is putting together a group of students called the Student Advisory Committee to deal with issues surrounding the Commonwealth College at the University of Massachusetts.

The Commonwealth College will replace the Honors Program, beginning with freshmen entering the University in the fall of 1999. Present freshmen will be able to choose between staying in the Honors Program or entering the Commonwealth College.

According to Jennifer Worcester, the senator from Orchard Hill Residential Area who is setting up the committee, there is a real need for the committee.

"Right now there is confusion between the Commonwealth College and the students. We need student input. We need to work with the committee to come to agreements," said Worcester.

More than a month ago Deputy Provost Norman D. Aitken discussed the Commonwealth College at an SGA meeting. Students expressed concern about the College, questioning whether it will be as good as Aitken described it.

Students have been concerned about how the College might effect the residents of Orchard Hill Residential Area because it is the possible location for Commonwealth College "learning communities."

"At first we thought people would be forced out of Orchard Hill, but it is not true. People may have to move to a different floor within the same building to allow Commonwealth College to have its own floors," Worcester said.

The arrival of the Commonwealth College will mean more required classes for its members and possibly new buildings.

"People need to sit down and make sure [the administration] is doing the right thing," Worcester said. "The state gave us this money and we want to look good. We need to monitor what goes on. We want to make sure things like professors being taken away from the rest of the students doesn't happen. Everyone needs to be happy."

The committee will consist of 12 seats, preferably with a representative from each residential area as well as students in the Resident Academic Program (RAP) and the Talent Advancement Program

Court fosters discourse on policy

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association Trustee Elly Court has been working with both students and administration to resolve the issues regarding the new admissions policy. Today there will be a closed meeting, set up by Court, to encourage more debate between students and Board of Trustees members.

The new admissions policy puts less emphasis on race as a factor in admissions than the old policy did. Student protestors have been holding rallies, meeting and teach–ins to show how disgusted they are with the new practice.

The task force has eight possible goals: the institution of a race–based affirmative action policy that can be expanded as needed, the expansion and improvement of support programs, the elimination of SAT scores as criteria for admission, the expansion of scholarships and grants, increased support for single parents, a moratorium on current admissions practices, autonomy for student support services and the improvement of elementary education. Court says she feels positive about previous dialogues and would like to see that they continue. She also says she felt Chancellor David K. Scott's open forum on Monday was a step in the right direction.

"I thought it was informative. He is trying to communicate the information, but it is hard information to digest, especially at a large forum. The specific information is hard to comprehend and it needs to be recognized that it touches on sensitive issues," said Court.

Court said that communication with the Chancellor is imperative. "I think that [it] is beyond the Chancellor to fix what is perceived as our problem. Critical dialogue must continue. I trust that the Chancellor is trying to work in the best interest of everyone, but because of legal restrictions it's hard for him to do what he wants to do."

Student trustee Elly Court.

Although Court sides with the task force on the issue, she says she does not think taking civil disobedience measures is a good idea.

"It is unfortunate that the campus is losing trust in the Chancellor," she said. "I also feel strongly that the only way to remedy the situation is to work within the University system, which includes the Trustees, the President, and the Chancellor. If I didn't believe that I wouldn't be setting up these meetings."

Court also said President William Bulger knows what is going on and encourages on–going meetings between the students and the administration. "He is aware of what we're doing and he is supportive," said Court. She added that she didn't think it was necessary it bring the matter directly to Bulger.

Court says she has faith in the Task Force, saying they have come up with "good remedies," to present at today's meeting, and that she supports them for raising debate about the issues among students.

Court also went on to say that she thinks this all started because of lack of communication.

"The issued exploded because of a communication breakdown. The University has to explore its commitment to people of color, and students have to be included in that process. But It all comes from communications," said Court.

Chhim gets 10 years for Cashin drug shooting

The Amherst teenager convicted of shooting former University of Massachusetts student Russell Bishop in the neck was sentenced to 8–10 years in prison yesterday.

Sokha Chhim, 18, was found guilty last Wednesday on charges of armed robbery, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, assault with a dangerous weapon and unlawful possession of a firearm. He was acquitted on one charge of assault with intent to murder.

Chhim's lawyer, Joseph Franco, said last week that he hoped the acquittal on the attempted murder charge would positively affect sentencing.

But that was not the case. Instead, Hampshire County Superior Court Justice Judd Carhart exceeded the state– recommended sentence of 5–to–7 years. He reasoned that Chhim narrowly escaped a murder charge since the bullet from his gun came within a centimeter of Bishop's carptid artery and nearly resulted in his death.

Chhim shot Bishop in the neck during a botched drug transaction in Cashin Residence Hall Oct. 30, 1998.

Serbians trap refugees inside Kosovo

By George Jahn
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Yugoslav authorities sealed off Kosovo's main border crossings yesterday, preventing ethnic Albanians from leaving as the wave of refugees approached the half–million mark.

As NATO stepped up its airstrikes, a Cypriot mediator sought freedom for three captured U.S. soldiers.

NATO planes and cruise missiles struck military targets in Kosovo and inflicted heavy damage elsewhere in Yugoslavia.

Albania's parliament approved NATO plans to send in 24 U.S. Apache attack helicopters — a move that should bolster the alliance's firepower against the Yugoslav tanks and armor that have driven ethnic Albanians from their homes in Kosovo.

After forcing more than 400,000 refugees out to neighboring countries, Yugoslav authorities closed the main exit route yesterday without explanation, forcing tens of thousands of people back toward the burned villages they had been escaping from.

German Defense Minister Rudolf Scharping warned that the Yugoslavs may be planning to use the civilians in Kosovo as "human shields" against NATO attack.

In Morini, the crossing point for Kosovo refugees into Albania, the flow of cars and tractors suddenly stopped at 3 a.m., witnesses said. Yugoslav border guards could be seen laying what appeared to be mines and digging fortifications just inside their territory.

"The refugees... were told to return to their places of residence — whatever is left of those places," said Doran Vienneau of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which has been monitoring the border.

Scharping said Yugoslav forces had begun forcing ethnic Albanians back from the border areas into the province.

He showed aerial photos that he said showed Serb tanks surrounding a Kosovo village, separating the men and women, and then opening fire on houses.

The former president of Cyprus, Spyros Kyprianou, began a mission to win the release of three American soldiers seized along the Yugoslav border with Macedonia on March 31. Cyprus, which is not a NATO member, has historically had close ties with Yugoslavia.

Kyprianou flew to Athens, where he said he was "waiting for the green light from Belgrade" before going to Yugoslavia today. He said he believed the release of the soldiers was imminent.

Sandy Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser, was cautious about the mission but said "we certainly would welcome any release."

Another nightmare was brewing for the tens of thousands of Kosovo refugees who had made it across into neighboring Macedonia only to be trapped for days in squalid conditions.

With frightening efficiency, Macedonian officials emptied the border city of Blace yesterday, hustling thousands of refugees onto buses so quickly that some were separated from their families. Macedonia, which has been criticized for conditions at the makeshift camp, said it shipped 10,000 refugees to Albania and moved 25,000 others to NATO tent camps further in–country. Aid workers said about 10,000 refugees from the camp were unaccounted for.

"Most people here don't know what their fate is going to be. They don't even know where their relatives are, where their mothers are," said Nebi Qena, 21, after being moved from Blace to a NATO–run camp. "My brother was on the other side of the border waiting to get in. I don't know if he was turned back."

Students challenge new ATM fees

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG) released a report at a press conference last Wednesday at the Northampton City Hall, that indicates a high percentage of people are unhappy with the ATM surcharges imposed by many banks.

According to MASSPIRG studies, more than nine out of 10 of the 336 national banks surveyed charge consumers a controversial Automatic Teller Machine surcharge in addition to fees already charged by most banks for using other banks' ATMs.

In fact, 71 percent of the banks surveyed collect a surcharge. This is a high rate compared to 1998 studies which indicated that only 3 percent of banks in Massachusetts collected a surcharge.

When the average $1.20 fee for using another bank's ATM is added to the average surcharge of $1.37, consumers are effectively paying double for the cost of one ATM transaction.

Ida Amaral, a BankBoston representative, agrees that surcharges can be a nuisance, but says they cannot be avoided.

"We charge them [customers] because we have to network [costs] with the other banks," Amaral said. "We usually don't have the same funds as other banks."

For example, if BankBoston customers use a Fleet ATM, they are effectively borrowing Fleet's funds. Therefore, in compensation for the costs, BankBoston has to pay Fleet, and those payments come from customers.

"The surcharge is no April Fool's joke," MASSPIRG's consumer coordinator Linda Garvie said in a press release last week. "The double–dipping ATM surcharge is an outrageous example of fee–gouging by banks."

Jennifer Worcester, senator of the Student Government Association, is a BankBoston cardholder who is paying fees for use of the ATMs and feels urgent action needs to be taken to ban the surcharges.

The availability of only BankBoston ATMs on campus is an inconvenience for many students who bank with other companies, she argues.

"For out–of–state students at UMass, the fees are even worse due to the fact that the only ATMs on campus are BankBoston," Worcester said. "As students we can not afford, and we should not tolerate, these outrageous fees."

According to Amaral, BankBoston has a contract with the University that grants them sole ownership of all the ATMs on campus. She says it is up to students to decide whether or not they want to avoid surcharges.

"It's your right to use another ATM," Amaral said. "But we can charge you [if you're a BankBoston customer] for using another bank's ATM."

Over the past two years, ATM surcharge bans and fee caps have been under consideration by at least 25 legislatures and two city councils. Although no bans have been enacted via state legislatures, Connecticut and Iowa have banned ATM surcharges by order of the Banking Commissioner.

In a MASSPIRG survey in which 300 UMass students were interviewed, 88.3 percent said they'd support a ban on ATM surcharges.

"State governments should protect consumers from outrageous fees, especially since Congress has failed to do so," Garvie said. "We recommend our senate for unanimously passing a ban of the ATM surcharges."

Garvie urges people to pressure the state legislature and Congress to stop the ATM surcharges.

Student rights motions pass at SGA meeting

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Student Government President Jeffery Howe and Trustee–elect Seth Avakian pushed three motions through the senate last night without debate from any senators. All of the motions had to do with students rights.

Two motions dealt specifically with students charged with crimes who are left to deal with the University of Massachusetts judicial system. Some of the accused turn to the judicial advisory committee, comprised of students trained to advise the accused but not allowed to advocate on his behalf.

However, most students don't know that there is a judicial advisory committee. "It has a bad location and most people know about it only through word of mouth," said Avakian.

The first motion stated that accused students may have a judicial advocate speak on their behalf if they wish, rather then just be given advice. The second motion stated that every student charged with a violation should be given the name and office number of a judicial advisor.

"You get assigned an advisor so you have a better working relationship," Avakian explained.

The last item on Howe and Avakian's agenda was a motion to inform students of their fourth amendment protection against unlawful and unjust searches and seizures. The motion mandated that a letter be sent out to all students prior to the start of the Fall 1999 semester. A friendly amendment added that residential assistants must read the rights to students at the first floor meeting of the semester.

In the year 2000, students may be granted a holiday on Good Friday so that students travelling long distances to be with their families for Easter and Passover won't have to worry about missing classes. The motion, which was brought to the floor by Senator Jeff Welch of Orchard Hill Residential Area and Senator Aaron Saunders from Sylvan Residential Area, passed unanimously.

The reason the motion was written to take effect two years from now, according to Welch, is that, "the calendars are already set. [Students] won't miss important things by class es and it is more convenient for the students — the Univeralty is [supposed to be] here for the students."

Welch and Saunders also sponsored another motion that passed last night, this time having to do with financial aid. The motion requested that the Financial Aid Office prepare a pamphlet on all the

Roe v. Wade attorney to speak at Amherst College

Sarah Weddington, the attorney who argued the winning side of the landmark Supreme Court reproductive rights case Roe v. Wade, will speak at Amherst College tonight at 8 p.m. in Johnson Chapel.

The title of Weddington's talk is: "Some Leaders Are Born Women." Nationally known for her work on issues affecting women, Weddington has served as an attorney, legislator, Presidential assistant, professor and expert called upon by the media. Recently she has worked to promote the development of leadership skills.

From 1978 to 1981, as an assistant to President Carter, Weddington led White House efforts to extend the time for ratification of the Equal Rights Association (ERA), assisted in the selection of women for federal judiciary appointments and co-chaired the U.S. Delegation to the United Nations Mid-Decade Conference on Women.

Weddington also implemented other programs to assist equal treatment of women in the military, in securing business loans and in social programs. She is the author of A Question of Choice, which details the Roe v. Wade case.

Weddington practices law in Austin, Texas, where she is a member of the Board of the Foundation for Women's Resources, which launched the Leadership Texas and Leadership America programs. At the University of Texas at Austin, where she is senior lecturer, she teaches a course called Leadership in America.

The lecture is free and open to the public.

Cultural Center Re-opens

Yuri-Kochiyama will be present for the re-opening of her honorary Yuri-Kochiyama Cultural Center, sponsored by the Asian American Student Association (AASA), taking place at 3 p.m. today.

After a dedication ceremony at 3 p.m. in the Cultural Center in Worcester Dining Hall, Kochiyama will be a guest lecturer at 7 p.m. in Mahar Auditorium as part of the Asian Latino/a African Native American (ALANA) lecture series today. Carmela Makabali, chair of AASA, feels that it is "nice to honor someone while they are still living," especially since Kochiyama is 78 years old.

Kochiyama's life has been committed to building bridges between Asian, black, and Puerto Rican communities through her revolutionary ideas, her fight for human rights and her love for mankind.

She was born in California in 1921 to a Japanese fishing family. Her father was falsely accused and detained for spying after the Pearl Harbor bombings, and died just days after his release. The rest of her family was then incarcerated at the Jerome concentration camp.

In New York during the 1950s, Kochiyama's family hosted open houses to spread knowledge about civil rights. In the 1960s, she and her family moved to Harlem and protested for equal education and rights for black and Puerto Rican workers. She later met and befriended Malcolm X. Though she did not agree with his anti-integration ideas at first, she later found common threads in their struggles. Kochiyama was the person who cradled Malcolm X after his assassination.

From the 1970s to the present, Kochiyama has worked to free political prisoners (similar to her father). She has participated in several legal defense committees, worked with revolutionary nationalist organizations and has joined political study groups to advocate her ideas. Kochiyama will also be speaking at Asian Night on Friday, April 9, in the Campus Center Auditorium at 7 p.m.

Zhu visits amid possible tension

By George Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — His China policy under attack, President Clinton warned yesterday that a souring of relations resulting from a "campaign-driven cold war" with China could erase the gains that he claimed for his policy of engagement with Beijing. Clinton commented in an address on China policy as Chinese Premier Zhu Rongji headed here for two days of talks on security issues, trade, Taiwan and other subjects.

In advance of Zhu's arrival, some Republicans have been seizing on alleged nuclear spying by China at secret U.S. facilities as well as fresh charges that the chief of China's military intelligence directed $300,000 to Clinton's re-election campaign in 1996.

"As the next presidential election approaches, we cannot allow a healthy argument to lead us toward a campaign-driven cold war with China, for that would have tragic consequences," Clinton said.

Among them, he said, would be "an end to diplomatic contacts that have produced tangible gains for our people, a climate of mistrust that hurts Chinese-Americans and undermines the exchanges that are opening China to the world."

The only beneficiaries, he added, would be "the most rigid backward-looking elements in China itself."

Zhu, whose six-city U.S. tour began Tuesday in Los Angeles, has acknowledged that serious differences could arise in his visit. Describing himself in a pre-departure Wall Street Journal interview as "an ordinary Chinese with a bad temper," Zhu said, "When I go to the U.S., it's very possible I'll have arguments with you."

He is expected to register China's differences with the United States on NATO's air war in Yugoslavia.

One unresolved issue is China's bid to join the World Trade Organization, which would open China's vast markets to American exports. U.S. and Chinese negotiators have spent long hours this week attempting to work out the final details in time for Zhu's visit.

White House officials declined to discuss the substance of the allegations concerning campaign finance and nuclear spying, citing ongoing investigations of both issues.

But Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., chairman of the House Government Reform and Oversight Committee, called on Clinton to insist China provide U.S. investigators bank records that "would demonstrate the origins of the millions of dollars that flowed" from China to the Democratic Party.

Clinton said American engagement with Beijing has yielded security benefits for the United States on a range of foreign policy hotspots from northeast Asia to the Middle East.

Among other advances, Clinton said U.S. ties with China helped the administration negotiate a nuclear freeze with North Korea five years ago and persuade China to stop selling weapons-related nuclear materials to Pakistan and Iran.

Clinton, apparently intent on not inflaming Zhu on the eve of his White House visit, softened the administration's rhetoric on human rights and offered only passing mention of Tibet in his speech.

Clinton praised the advances in the rights situation in China over the past decade and said it is in China's own interest to establish a more open society.

Debate over Internet learning begins

By Anjetta McQueen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Farzad Naeim, an earthquake engineer from Los Angeles who decided to go to law school, didn't have time for campus meetings and classroom lectures. So when Kaplan's Concord Law School was launched last fall, Naeim enrolled to get his education through the Internet.

"I figure if I go to a standard school four nights a week, that eliminates the chance for me to see my kids grow up," said Naeim, 44. "I get my assignments off the computer, and I can study after the kids go to bed."

Hundreds of universities are launching courses or degree programs online. But a pair of reports being released today question whether a seat in front of a computer is as good as a seat in a college classroom.

The reports' complaints range from whether the programs' effectiveness is evaluated properly and whether they cost too much to whether they are unfair to certain students.

The College Board warns in its report that Internet courses could hinder the progress of poor and minority students who arrive at college with less exposure to computers than white or more-affluent students.

"There's this rush to get online and go virtual... Colleges, policy-makers and [Internet] providers who are driving this market need to think about broad access," Larry F. Gladieux, a senior College Board researcher, said Tuesday.

A second report, by the Institute for Higher Education Policy, says colleges still lack enough knowledge about Internet-based education to justify its rapid growth. For example, studies haven't explained a higher dropout rate for Internet-based learners — 32 percent compared with 4 percent for classroom students in one study — or looked at whether students do better from Internet instruction alone or from a mix of Internet and classroom learning.

"Many of the studies suggest the grades of distance learners are higher or comparable," said Jamie Merisotis, president of the institute, which did the study for two teachers' unions. "We don't know whether the poorer performers are dropping out at a higher rate."

Right now, 26,000 courses online teach roughly 750,000 students. They include the online law school and courses at Stanford University, the University of California, Los Angeles, and Duke. The most visible advance, supporters say, is the first-time accreditation of a wholly online school: Students at Jones International University, operated out of Denver, now have such privileges as transferring credits and earning employer tuition reimbursements.

"I wondered if I was going to get a quality education," said Joan Crittenden, a Navy safety official from Waldorf, Md., who received her master's degree in business communications from Jones in December. "I actually think I did get a better education. More of the resources were at my fingertips."

Distance learning started with classes taken by mail or by watching teachers' lectures on videos or cable television. But unlike correspondence school or video-lecture predecessors, Internet-based distance learning has a place on campus, too.

Library nightlife

There are two things that are absolutely true in the UMass area. I mean these two things are not arguable and they are not matters of opinion. These two things are concrete facts that demand attention. The first absolute truth is that the W.E.B. Du Bois Library sucks! Honestly, there is nothing good about it. I'm surprised that the ALANA students haven't protested that it is named after an African–American and try to get it changed to the Richard Nixon or Dan Quayle Library. That way it would be named after an infamous white guy.

The second absolute truth is that the immediate Amherst area needs a huge dance club/bar where tons of kids with real and fake IDs can go to have a good time.

Let's start with why the library sucks. First of all, bricks fall out of it. I don't know if I really need to go on to prove my point, but I will. The next problem is that every floor besides the ones with computers on them reek of 75–year–old books. You can't study on these floors; the smell will either cause you to pass out or vomit. If you have a strong enough stomach to study on these floors, then beware. They are so damn quiet that you can't help but think that someone is going to sneak up and kill you.

The last point that I will make is that it is a hassle to find a book there. For such a humongous library the librarians have come up with a decent system for filing books, but if a book isn't in its place, then it could seriously remain lost for decades. These are a few of the reasons that our giant phallus of a library sucks.

As far as the dance club problem goes: this is obvious. Most of the bars around here are extremely small and cramped. There definitely isn't a place that can really accommodate the amount of people that could potentially show up on any given night. If you really want to go out and dance the only places to go are Pruddy's and frats. The dance floor at Pruddy's is about the size of a handicap–accessible stall in one of the bathrooms on campus. The music at frats either sucks, so you don't want to dance, or is all right and gets too crowded to dance. There is no place that plays all sorts of techno and dance music around here.

Dan Viens

After pondering this I made it my quest to become the proprietor of the greatest dance club the world has ever seen.

Here is my solution. I want to buy the library from the Du Bois family and turn it into a humongous club. The first thing I would do is take out absolutely all of the books and furniture and make a huge pile by the pond. Then I would begin my massive redecorating project.

On the main floor I would rip up the rug and replace it with six–inch–thick wall–to–wall plush carpet. Next I would saturate it with liquid Tide. Then I would replace all of the lights in the ceiling with black lights and multicolored dance lights. This would be the main dance floor. Where the microfiche once was would now be people–grinding, break– dancing or Irish dancing depending on what music was being played.

The rest of the floors, except for the top five, would all have themes. Some of them would be permanent and others would be in a constant state of rotation and change. One permanent area would make use of the second through fourth floors. There wouldn't be anything on the second floor. This is because the floor of the third floor would be a giant trampoline. The third floor ceiling/fourth floor would be ripped out so people would be able to bounce really high to whatever the trampoline DJ was spinning.

It is ridiculous that there is a 13th floor of the library. Everyone knows that really tall buildings should not have a 13th floor. Therefore I would fill the entire 13th floor with rubber. This would serve two purposes. First, the 13th floor would be made obsolete and secondly, the rubber would not allow water from the 14th floor to leak throughout the building. On the 14th floor there would be numerous hot tubs. There would be all sorts of foam parties and what–not.

As for the top five floors; those would be mine. The top three would be my penthouse and the two below would be left for my close personal friends.

Each night all of the floors would play completely different music. One floor would be playing techno while another would play Phish.

For the last half hour of every night, the same music would be played throughout the library. It would be a sort of unifying event.

As for the books and furniture, they would all be burnt on the night of the grand opening and would be part of a huge drunken tribal dance. I think that as long as we're going to knock down the fence, why don't we go a little further to realize my vision and bring some life back to this campus.

Dan Viens is a Collegian columnist.

Say what?

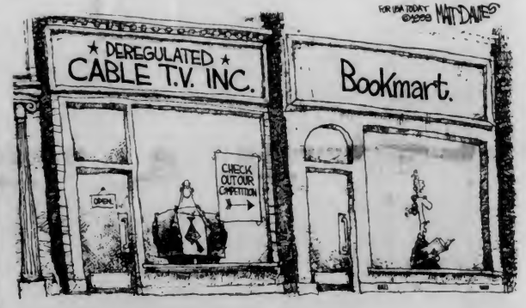
Last year's national tobacco settlement mandated that Philip Morris create its own $75 million media campaign to discourage teenage smoking. About 3 million (over a third) American teenagers now smoke, and about one third of all smokers will die of smoking–related illnesses, the government estimates. A recent California study has shown evidence that smoking in the teenage years causes permanent genetic changes in the lungs and forever increases the risk of lung cancer, even if the smoker quits. Such damage is less likely among smokers who start in their twenties.

Tanya Mannes

Because youths are so vulnerable to the effects of smoking, it follows that they should be educated about the risks. It seems a thoughtless provision of the settlement to place some of the educational responsibility on Philip Morris itself (over the next 25 years, the states will get $206 billion to develop their own ads, however).

There is a fundamental conflict between ads encouraging adults to smoke, and ads giving lip service to "saying no." The heavy–handed Philip Morris ads show youths being coaxed to take a cigarette but rejecting the offer, in settings such as a school bus, a school building and a playground. Meanwhile, their Virginia Slims brand appears in breezy advertisements showing tough, assertive women. The slogan: "It's a woman thing."

"The Phillip Morris ads are about as effective as Nancy Reagan's "Just Say No" campaign back in the '80s."



It is not surprising that the dark, dramatic ads turn teens off, and that recent state–initiated research, as reported in the April 7, 1999 Boston Globe, shows that their "choice theme" "severely impaired the effectiveness," said Howard K. Koh, commissioner of the state Department of Public Health.

The ads are about as effective as Nancy Reagan's "Just Say No" campaign back in the '80s and almost as frightening as the commercial: "This is your brain (hold up an egg). This is your brain on drugs (drop egg into sizzling frying pan). Any questions?"

Philip Morris has rejected allowing an independent media company to develop new ads. The senior vice president for Philip Morris USA, Ellen Merlo, said, "We think, from our research, that our message does communicate... effectively." Such a statement contradicts generally accepted principles of marketing research. The Qualitative Research Consultants Association (QRCA) explains in Why Should I Use a Professional Moderator? that an independent professional should conduct the research to avoid bias, as well as for other reasons.

Advertisers know that melodramatic pleas rarely work. Cigarette–maker Philip Morris exploits this effect so that its youth–aimed ads are not meaningful, but laughable. Massachusetts is joining 16 other states attacking the company publicly for its useless ads against teen smoking. Meanwhile, Morris continues its exercise in irony.

Letters to the Editor

"Wrong–headed" paper published prof.'s piece

To the editor:

I do not recall giving my permission to The Minuteman to reprint my article from the Campus Chronicle but it is quite possible that I have done so (certainly not in writing).

In any event I would not have given permission had I known that it would appear in an issue that is characterized by wrong–headed and distasteful rhetorical overkill such as printing a photo of President Clinton with a swastika on his forehead next to Manson, the mass murderer. I also find terms like "racist terrorists" (p. 11) inflammatory and misleading. This is the style and language of political extremism that discredits the goals it allegedly seeks to advance.

MCAT with an attitude

Well, it's been quite a while since I've written a column; actually, it's been an entire month since I've "voiced" my opinions via the Collegian, and boy, do I need to vent. I was going to stand in front of the Student Union and throw a temper tantrum until someone listened to me, but I decided that this column would be the best way to go.

You see, I've been studying for the Medical College Admission Test (MCAT) for three hours per day since January, and needless to say, I've been irritable lately. (Oh come on, how great of a mood would you be in if you constantly studied the theory of relativity and the female menstrual cycle, and if the only sex you were exposed to was that of bacteria?) Anyway, I've been a little snappy and even more aware of those things that piss me off. There are a number of things that aggravate everyone, but during my MCAT studies I have noticed a select number of people that I can definitely do without; I hope you enjoy...

I. Any guy that is obsessed with Drew Barrymore. I'm really sorry about this, guys, but I can't think of anything but Miss Piggy when I see her. She was really great in E.T. and she was good in her whole five–minute participation in Scream, but I think that even Linda Tripp would look better on a poster or calendar than "piggy girl." And by the way, if you don't think she looks like Miss Piggy, look at a picture of her and imagine her saying, "Moi?" I guarantee you'll see what I'm talking about.

II. Anyone older than sixty who is deaf, dumb and blind, and still drives. I love old people; I really do. But when you reach the point where you shrink to less than one–half of your original height, you can't remember your street address and you travel at speeds no more than 10 miles–per–hour under the speed limit, then I think it's time to hand in your license. Consider it a gesture to humanity. And they only seem to come out when you're in a hurry.

"Damn, I'd better hurry up and get to the Mass Pike before I hit rush hour traffic," you think to yourself. And then boom! Smack–dab in front of you is some centuries–old beehive head that is going 45 on Route 91! And to make things worse, she's driving her new 1999 V–8 DeVille in two lanes, squinting painfully as she tries to see the car five feet in front of her, making it impossible to pass the wench. So, you lay on the horn (praying that she can hear it) or run her off the road; whichever one works the best for you, and finally, you're on your way again — only an hour behind schedule.

Look, I don't want to rag on the "youthfully challenged," but if you can't even get your car into third gear, then it's time to play bingo— hang up your license.

III. Everyone from Everett. Nothing good has ever come out of Everett and nothing ever will. They think they're the greatest, but even Revere and Chelsea contribute more to the world; at least Revere has a nice beach and Chelsea has a great school system. Sorry, Dana.

IV. Sleeveless jackets and sweaters. Will someone please explain this moronic idea to me? You're paying more money for less clothing and it looks stupid! You look like you're wearing a life preserver. Unless you're planning on being inside a crashing plane or sailing on the Titanic, take that damn thing off.

Now, I know that I'm not exactly Mr. Versace, but I can point out an ugly trend. Someone has actually told me that they keep you warm. Well, then why don't I see anyone wearing just the "half–assed garment" and no other shirt? Or with just a T–shirt underneath? Everyone that wears these things wears long–sleeved Abercrombie shirts with the big, single stripe down the sleeve underneath them. Try getting a whole jacket next time... I guarantee you'll be warmer.

V. Pretentious people (part II). Yeah, I wrote an article totally dedicated to smug, well–to–do pretentious people, but here are a few characteristics that I left out.

People that use "e.g." and "i.e." in sentences while speaking out loud should be "done away with," as well as those people that say "ergo" instead of "therefore." Also on my list of undesirables are those British wannabes who say, "Well, I never!" or "Have you ever?!" to express disgust or shock. This is really stupid and makes no sense. You never what? I thought British people were supposed to use good grammar. Whatever.

Gary Mendese

Finally, if you announce to the world more than 6 times that you're an English major and you don't know what you're going to do for work when you graduate, then I could do without you, too. If your major sucks that much, switch! Join SOM like the rest of the students who don't know what to major in.

VI. Internet whores. No, this has nothing to do with cybersex, I'm referring to those people that stay online 24/7 even when they're not in their rooms. Some people even sign on to that eight–minute number, check their mail and then walk away from the computer, still connected. Hello! There are other people that want to check their email. And as stimulating as getting busy signals for an hour might seem to you, I'd rather be watching a Drew Barrymore movie. Just check your mail and get your ass offline. You know who you are and I hope you catch the Melissa Virus!

VII. People already wearing shorts. Um, I hate to break it to you, but it's only the beginning of April. It snowed this time last year. Just because it's sunny outside does not mean that you should wear Jams and a wife–beater on your five–mile walk to the LGRT. Chances are, it's going to be cold the next day and then you're probably going to get sick. I don't know, maybe a nice virulent strain of pneumonia is just the medicine that you need (won't I be a great doctor?).

VIII. People who protest just to protest. This is dedicated to the people that use a sensitive issue and participate in a protest just as an excuse to miss class or make yourself look brave (Hi, GEO). If you're really clueless about the subject, then stay out of it. And if you're using a time of upheaval to stick in your own desires and demands about an entirely different issue, then you should rot in hell. Wow, I'm starting to feel much better!

IX. Tough guys. You know who I'm talking about: the guys that walk around like they have 10 extra Y– chromosomes and are strutting around everywhere like they have jock itch, waiting for someone to notice how strong they are and yell, "Hercules, Hercules, Hercules!" On the outside they seem like big tough men, but on the inside, they're nothing but little bitches. Believe me, I'm not saying that I'm Mr. Tough, but why people have to fake is beyond me. God forbid you show people who you really are.

So there you have it: my list of psychotic hatreds. Nah, I'm really just kidding around. It's the MCAT (or is it the amphetamines?). It's a pretty big exam and it's coming up in nine days (but who's counting). I'm sure I'll feel better afterward. Who knows, I might even have something positive to write about.

Right... and this affirmative/negative action debate will end sometime this millennium.

Enter the world of SubUrbia

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

As college students, we all know the stress, hardships and desires that accompany our four years here. College, like life itself, is a fantasy with its own romanticized ideals, but the reality of it is much different. It will be a spell of relief, then, as well as a catalyst for thought, when the UMass Theatre Guild presents Eric Bogosian's college-age play SubUrbia tonight through Saturday night at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. An additional Saturday matinee is scheduled for 2 p.m.

SubUrbia follows a rich theater semester that includes the Guilds' rousing production of Little Shop of Horrors and a unique adaption of Romeo and Juliet, also running this weekend at the Rand Theater.

SubUrbia, though, is a different sort of production for the Theatre Guild. It concerns themes such as the teenager-to- adult transition, career ambitions and making something out of one's life.

"It's a college theatre group, but in the past, [the Guild's] actors had to choose caricatures, people not like themselves," said director Paul Larochelle. "The focus was on external work rather than internal work. This time they had to look for internal work."

Larochelle, a transfer student making his college directorial debut, originally nominated the play and was later assigned to direct it by production manager/technical director Matthew Cavanaugh, who said that SubUrbia is "the one we really caught interest in [when deciding on a play]. It appeals to this campus. I have friends like this at home."

SubUrbia takes place, naturally, at a suburban convenience store where eight twenty-somethings waste away their days, disenchanted with life in the fictional town of Burnfield. Some of them want to stay, some want to leave, but each of them escape from their problems by hanging out at the convenience store.

Until one day, when "Pony" (Greg Hoyt) comes back to Burnfield, having made it as a rock star. His return causes sudden panic among the eight friends, who must suddenly question where they are and what they're doing with their lives.

The convenience store was the central image in the mind of director Larochelle.

"This convenience store is their comfort zone. It allows them to fool themselves, to pretend they're fine, to hide from their lives. The truth is, they're not doing anything with their lives."

Because SubUrbia relies mainly on dialogue to explore the characters, its key element is the ensemble acting. Kevin Kelliher, Michael Chiavarroli, Rob Killeen, Lindsey Bovaird, Stephanie Romano, Adam Seigel, Tamara Garabedian, Vanessa Fors and Hoyt were all called upon to do some intense, as well as darkly comedic, acting.

"I didn't have images of the characters in mind," said Larochelle. "My intention was not to type-cast. We looked [instead] for actors who were most able to reach into the inner depths of the characters and capture their inner lives."

For the rehearsal process, Larochelle began by focusing on acting techniques, having each actor figure out what his/her character's desires and objectives were.

"They didn't get up on their feet right away. We took time slowly learning the play," said Larochelle.

The slow learning process was somewhat due to the play's unusual plot — unusual because of the lack of one.

"The biggest challenge was discovering the fact that not a lot happens... It unravels very slowly," explained Larochelle. "The struggle was: do I betray the script and the truth of the characters to entertain the audience or do I let the characters guide themselves?"

The decision, ultimately, was to concentrate on that inner life, hoping an audience who could identify with such characters would stay with them on their personal journeys. The result of this decision will perhaps depend on your own view of yourself and your ambitions.

Tickets for SubUrbia are on sale at the Bowker Box Office and are $5 for students. Call 545-2511 for more information.

Ensemble acid jazz fills Valley

Jazz/Blues Weekly

By Charlie Apicella

The popularity of groove and acid jazz has peaked within the past few years, and tenor saxophonist Javon Jackson's newest Blue Note release entitled Pleasant Valley is almost a musician's guide to the music. The record touches upon nearly every major 1960s acid jazz style, but takes the music a step further creating a very organic, tight brand of groove-jazz. It's a very listenable album full of some of the most solid playing on this type of music heard in a long time.

This record has the sound of a truly group affair, and as a whole the album works so well because each player firmly sticks to his own role. It seems as if each player is committed to the role of accompanist, and at no time do individual members try to stand out by playing above the rest of the ensemble or above the music itself. Even the front man, Jackson, hears his role as a member of the band, and few times does he try to carry the music, which allows for a good deal of tight interplay with organist Larry Goldings.

Jackson is very melodic and stays around the middle range of his horn. He is a tenor player who does not kill his statements with such clichéd elements as over-emphasized dynamics or long, empty strings of notes. In fact, he hardly ever uses the upper ranges of the horn, and sounds like he is really listening to what he is playing — something which a number of younger players attempting this type of music have a tendency to ignore. By doing this, Jackson brings a fresh, insightful interpretation to his music.

Guitarist Dave Stryker's playing is flawless, and through the course of the album he visits the sounds of a number of '60s and '70s acid jazz guitarists like Grant Green, Wes Montgomery and Kenny Burrell. Also at times he uses some virtuoso elements similar to Pat Martino, but more sparingly, and a good deal more bluesy.

Larry Goldings takes on the role of a '60s organist head- on. He plays solid bass lines which have much chordal motion, and his role as accompanist is solid and under- stated. He is the sole harmonic presence on nearly all the tunes as Stryker, for the most part, lays out all together behind Jackson's solos.

The order of tracks is key to the overall sound of the disc, and Dave Stryker's use of acoustic guitars on some tracks breaks it up a little and adds a nice texture to the tunes. This is first heard in the opening ballad, "Sunswept Sunday." This tune is for the most part a duet between Jackson and Stryker in which their melodic voices really play off each other.

The second track of the album, "Pleasant Valley," is a catchy melody laid over a sprawling, electric rhythm section that sounds as if it could be straight out of Miles Davis' "Live Evil." The tune climaxes in an awesome John McLaughlin-inspired solo by Stryker, who really captures the essence of the tune.

Drummer Bill Drummond is solid throughout, and his constantly evolving rhythm patterns form a very full base for all of the tunes. The tune "In The Pocket" is a straight-ahead Maceo funk built on a tight groove locked by him.

Pleasant Valley is definitely an album to look for within the coming weeks, as it is scheduled for a June 29 release on the Blue Note label.

Kaufman's Tromeo and Juliet to be shown today at Herter

By Mike Messores
Collegian Staff

One thing that Best Picture winner Shakespeare in Love is credited with is doing what seemed to be impossible: making Shakespeare sexy.

But Gwyneth and Joseph were a few years behind Troma Entertainment's Tromeo and Juliet, a radical reinvention of the old story of Romeo and Juliet, complete with nudity, excessive gore and bathroom humor. While some may argue about just how "sexy" it is, no one can argue with its silliness in taking something tried and true and turning it on its head.

The man behind Troma Entertainment, Lloyd Kaufman, will be at Herter Hall 227 tonight to introduce the film, along with the trailer for a new Troma film, and sign copies of his new book All I Need to Know About Filmmaking I Learned from The Toxic Avenger. Kaufman will be introduced by UMass Film professors Richard Burt, who will also sign copies of his book Unspeakable ShaXXspeares.

Troma Entertainment, which has been called one of the few independent film companies left in America, is the force behind such films as the Kabukiman NYPD and The Toxic Avenger. All of its films are marked by low budgets, low production values, sex and scantily clad females. Which is just what they want, I'm sure.

Starring Jane Jensen as Juliet and Will Keenan as Tromeo, the 1997 film takes place in present-day lower Manhattan, with a war between the Capulets and the Montagues. Sound vaguely familiar? But in the original text, was there a Tyrone Capulet? A Murray Martini? Hmmm... And does anyone die because his head got stuck in an electric car window?

While purists like Harold Bloom may argue with such changes, there's a refreshing anything-goes mentality with the movie. Characters suffer mortal wounds, only to wander around for scenes at a time, spurting blood. People mutate. Tromeo poetically tells Juliet how much he loves her... over the phone... while he's going to the bathroom. This isn't Kenneth Branaugh's Hamlet. It's Lloyd Kaufman, who is a misplaced Shakespeare lover. This movie was overseen by a man who respects the artistic material.

Some may be offended by the changes, but the changes are a lot more welcome and inviting than is the Leonardo DiCaprio version of Romeo and Juliet.

Of course, you can always judge for yourself tonight.

Lloyd Kaufman will be at Herter Hall 227 at 6:30 tonight. Tromeo and Juliet will be shown at 7:00.

"So?"

"So? Baseball... baseball was America. It had its faults, but it was just so right. It was outdoors, in the summer. The sound of the ball when hit just right with a wooden bat. That smack of leather. The smells, the grass stains and dirt on a uniform. It could be so perfect. So perfect."

For those of us who spent every recess, every day after school hitting tennis balls with wiffleball bats wrapped in electrician tape and stuffed with wet paper towels, baseball is youth. It's growing up. It's summers with friends. It's dad underhand-tossing baseballs to you in the back yard. It's knowing that getting hit by a pitch only hurts for a bit ("Walk it off, Messaros" — thanks, coach. Next time you lean into the plate). It's learning that hitting a curve sucks. It's spring. It's rebirth. It's starting new.

Field of Dreams is a gorgeous valentine to the national pastime. It shamelessly blends fantasy and reality, creating a modern-day fable of life, faith, dreams and relationships, using baseball as a metaphor. Just as before that first game in April all teams are equal, their slates wiped clean, a baseball field carved into an Iowa cornfield gives men a second chance.

It's the only movie that's broken me down emotionally. I'm a pool of water watching that movie. It's the rare male tear-jerker; it touches on two of the softest points in the male psyche: dreams unfulfilled and father/son relationships.

Ray Kinsella (Kevin Costner, in perhaps his finest role — and don't tell me he doesn't have any, because there are also JFK and Bull Durham) is an Iowa farmer who hears a voice one day — "Build it and he will come." Going on blind faith, he plows most of his cornfield and builds a beautiful ballpark. "Until I heard the voice," Ray says, "I had never done a crazy thing in my entire life."

The field is soon inhabited by old ballplayers, appearing magically out of the cornfield. The first one is Shoeless Joe Jackson (Ray Liotta, pre-Goodfellas), Ray's father's favorite player. A real baseball player who died years before, Shoeless Joe was banned, some say unfairly, for life from the game he loved so much. You can see the joy in the player's faces playing on the field like kids.

The field becomes a second chance for many people. Terence Mann (James Earl Jones), a now-cynical '60s activist comes and rediscovers his spirit. Most emotional is Archie "Moonlight" Graham (Burt Lancaster and Frank Whaley), a small-town doctor who got to play a half inning in the outfield with the New York Giants.

It is baseball that allows everyone to rediscover their lives, their dreams. What happens on that baseball field is magic. Faith is restored, bonds are reformed. And it's all because, we are told, of the power of baseball. "The one constant through all the years," Mann says, "has been baseball. America has rolled by like an army of steamrollers, it's been erased like a blackboard, rebuilt and erased again. But baseball has marked the time. This game, this field is a part of our past, Ray. It reminds us of all that once was good and it could be again."

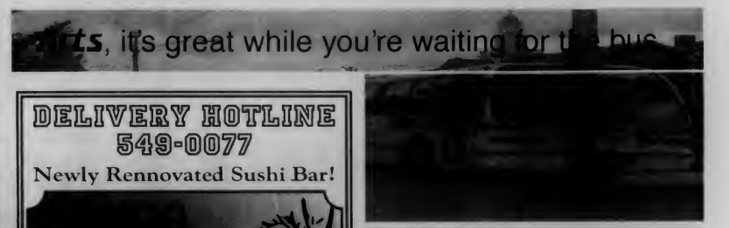
The suggestion that baseball is so healing is idealistic to say the least, but hints at the passion behind the creators of this tale. They recognize in the game something that touches every generation, no matter what other differences there are. It's a way for fathers and sons to connect wordlessly. It's universal.

Archie does get his one at bat, but then must chose between his dreams and his calling as a doctor. He grows old once he steps over the line that divides the field from the farm and he can't go back. But when he's leaving, heading towards the cornfield, Shoeless Joe calls after him, "Hey rookie — you were good." It echoes the time in our lives when we look at ourselves and realize just what our limitations are, when we put the bat and glove away for good. We've lost our dreams to reality, and that's hurt each and every one of us at one point in our lives.

As Archie says earlier, reminiscing about his one time playing in the outfield, then having to retire: "It was like having it this close to your dreams and then watching them brush past you, like a stranger in the night." But he does get to finally touch his dreams, even if for a fleeting moment, before going on his way.

Most touching is the end of the movie, where Ray finds out what all of his work has gotten him — standing by home plate, taking off his catching equipment, is Ray's father.

The scene is simple and emotional. Earlier, Ray told Mann about his relationship with his father, about how he rejected a game of catch with him at 14, and how he called his father's hero a criminal. "Son of a bitch died before I could take it back. Before I could tell him... well..." But Ray can't even say it then.



Instead of letting out all of his feelings, trying to right any wrong between them, he simply asks, "Hey Dad — You want to have a catch?" His father nods, "I'd like that," picking up his glove, and tossing him the ball. It's a beautiful moment, caught in the sepia tones of a fading day, framed by Iowa cornfields. Ray has gotten the second chance that none of us do — to tell someone how they feel after they've died, even with such a simple gesture as playing catch. And as the camera pulls skyward, they have come, the visitors drawn to the field, in cars that stretch back to the horizon.

Because sometimes baseball can be magic. At its most perfect, it's heaven and life and beauty

Connect your heart to the latest in T.V. love

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

Spring has arrived and love is on the air.

For whatever reason, love game shows have returned to TV, and they're literally hitting harder than ever before. All throughout TV's history, there have been series such as "The Dating Game," "The Newlyweds Game" and of course, "Love Connection." For the past decade, these games seemed to be on a lull, with a minute amount being shown. All of a sudden, there has been a recent trend of achievement with these types of shows, highlighted by an all new "Love Connection" and "Change of Heart."

Since all of the networks are trying their best to organize line-ups for next year, some of the programming that is on now can be crucial to decisions made for the future. If the choices are made based on what's popular right now, we will be seeing a lot of love shows next year.

The king of love used to be Ike Turner, but now it's "Change of Heart." The new series, with host Chris Jagger, has become a huge success on syndicated TV, and gained an enormous following of loyal viewers.

"Change of Heart" allows couples to give up their relationship for one night and take an excursion with someone of the opposite sex who is free from the character flaws that have been annoying them.

Jagger's job (which is easier than the guy who arranges the porno movies on the shelf at Adults Only on Route 9) is to be a mediator between the guests as they describe their blind dates with their perfect counterpart. The complainer in the relationship (usually the man) is not the only one who is set up on a blind date. "Change of Heart" sends both members on a rendezvous with someone else, and then gives them the choice at the end of the show to decide whether they choose to stay with their long-time love, or have a change of heart and try for a new life with their blind date.

The best part about the entire show is the look on someone's face when they are shot down. Sometimes it's the blind date, other times it's the counterpart of the person who opts for a change of heart, but there truly is nothing better than seeing a look of sheer heartbreak on a person's face. It just screams, "Thank you, Mr. Jagger, for allowing me to join you on national TV. I'm going to go kill myself now."

Some other hilarious antics that take place on "Change of Heart" include vicious insults, as well as countless bragging about the size of genitalia. It really is fun for the whole family.

"Love Connection" has made a return to TV after about a five-year absence. The last time it was on the air, the host was Chuck Woolery, who has not been seen since. "The Love Connection" has an all-new look with a new host, Pat Bullard, straight off his horrible bombing stand-up career. Bullard takes over where other "Love Connection" hosts have left off — as a director of two people sent on blind dates, and are back on the show to explain the loudly amusing antics that took place, which almost always begin with the guy saying something brilliant such as, "Well Pat, the first thing I noticed were her breasts."

The show ends with a comparison of who the guest chose from the three choices with the audience's choice. If the choice matches "The Love Connection" will pay for another date between the two. The guests, who are clearly void of people skills, usually spend most of the show trying to keep their self esteem, rather than explaining how well the date went. In one particular instance, a man spent the entire half hour defending how it was "cool to take a date back to your house and spend the entire night showing her how good you are at computer violence games." This guest was obviously the victim of ridicule from not only the audience, the host and his date, but pretty much everyone he'd ever met.

Most of the guests on "Love Connection" have really important jobs such as: consultant, builder and, my personal favorite, mall shopper. All together, "Love Connection" just helps to prove that even though these people are in search of love, they should be in search of a life.

Another new love show on TV is "Forgive or Forget." The show has different people describing their differences in a Jerry Springer-like manner, and usually has a lot of fights about stolen significant others. The host of this gem is known as Mother Love, and if you don't believe me, check out the web page at www.forgiveorforget.com — you'll be pleasantly surprised that you can check out information about the show, as well as ask Mother Love questions about your own love life. I sent her a question that said,

"Dear Mother Love,

I'm a 40-year-old host of a horrible show, and I think I'm as good as Rosie and Oprah. I'm annoying, and couldn't get a husband if I paid for one. I really, really need to stop giving people love advice, and get a real job. By the way, the guests on my show are really, really smart, and some even have a high school diploma. Please help me."

Sadly, I didn't get a response. However, Mother Love, who lends her advice to helpless country folk, is actually an annoying 40-year-old woman who just shouldn't be on TV.

If you're looking for love, the TV has it. However, don't quote me there, because I certainly don't advocate making love to your TV.

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can avoid with SRAs—tax-deferred annuities from TIAA-CREF. SRAs not only ease your current tax bite, they offer an easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in pretax dollars, you pay less in taxes now. And since earnings on your SRAs are tax deferred, your money works even harder for you.

Today, we offer other before- and after-tax financial solutions, including IRAs and mutual funds. They're backed by the same investment expertise, low expenses, and personal service that have made TIAA-CREF the choice of America's educational and research community.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Stop by your benefits office or call us at 1 800 842-2776 and find out how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy happier returns.

we can remember people have been linking America's two favorite pastimes: baseball and sex.

That's what Bull Durham is all about. The comedy is told through the eyes of Annie Savoy (Susan Sarandon), the aging groupie who each year takes a member of the local Durham Bulls under her wing (so to speak), but it never fails to splice the baseball and sex together.

Nor does it fail to capture the summertime magic of a Single A minor–league baseball team in a quiet North Carolina town.

Veteran catcher Crash Davis (Kevin Costner in perhaps his finest role — and don't tell me he doesn't have any because there are also JFK and Field of Dreams) and young pitching prospect Ebby Calvin "Nuke" LaLoosh (Tim Robbins) are the two other key players — as antagonistic team members and Annie's potential love interests.

Annie chooses to spend the season with Nuke, but not until after perhaps the movie's most famous quote, a Costner mini–soliloquy that starts, "I believe in the soul..." From there, viewers are bombarded with sexual references.

When he strikes out the day after Annie chooses Nuke as her lover, Annie writes Crash a note telling him he's not opening his hips on his follow–through. Crash writes a note back, "I want to make love to you."

After a dismal Bulls road trip, Annie convinces Nuke to rechannel his sexual energy into his pitching, telling him to breathe out of his eyelids like "the lava lizards of the Galapagos Islands."

When Nuke starts winning, Crash implores him to keep doing whatever he's doing. "A player on a streak has to respect the streak." This means that Nuke abstain from sex and continue to wear a set of Annie garters, a good luck superstition that keeps him focused.

What results is a sexually–charged argument between Annie and Crash, one in which she eventually admits to herself as much as to Crash, "I want you."

Eventually, Nuke loses a game and comes a–calling over at Annie's place. But Nuke gets called up to the majors (from single–A ball, I guess that's Hollywood). Crash gets released and takes up with another team to finish out the season.

When he's done, he inevitably comes back to Annie, a scene completely expected by now. But the payoff, just like the build–up, is slow and erotic. It is what Glamour magazine called "The Best What–Took–Us–So–Long Kiss" in the movies. Oh, but it's so much more than that.

League and Major League II.

In the first Major League movie, a town that had seen nothing but losing is ready for a winner, but the new owner Rachel Phelps (Margaret Way) is intent on making the team even worse, then moving them from Cleveland to Miami.

So Phelps invites only bad players to camp, players no one has ever heard of or has–been players. Namely, she invites players like the Rick "Wild Thing" Vaughn (Charlie Sheen), a fast ball pitcher with a control problem; Pedro Cerano (Dennis Haysbertt), a power hitter who can't hit curve balls or the breaking stuff; Willie "Mays" Hayes (Wesley Snipes), who has great speed but wants to be a glorified power hitter. Then there are the has–beens like Jake Taylor (Tom Berenger), who was a great catcher but now has bad knees; and finally Roger Dorn (Corbin Bernson), who was the returning star but is full of himself and couldn't play defense.

The team struggles through spring training and then picks it up through the course of the season. They manage to do this despite Phelps' attempts to throw them off track by taking away the "perks," which are really essentials that major league teams need to win ball games. General manager Charlie Donanvan tells head coach Lou Brown of Phelps' plan to move the team, so they all begin to play harder to win. This brings us to the scene when the team members bring out the cardboard cut–out of Phelps and strip her with every game they win in order to become the division champs.

The team roars back and ends up in a one–game playoff with the hated Yankees, which they win when Wild Thing Vaughn strikes out the Yank's triple crown winner.

Taylor also makes peace with his long–time girlfriend Lynn Wells (Rene Russo), who was about to marry an attorney.

It's an all–around feel–good movie that is topped only by the excitement of the sequel.

The sequel involved the team returning, but with problems: Vaughn wasn't the Wild Thing any more. He comes back with a suit and a clean–cut image that he will eventually have to change to be successful. Much of the movie is spent with the fair–weather Indians fans trashing the team they loved the year before. This too is something a fan from Boston can sympathize with — after all, the fans in Boston don't give ball players any leeway.

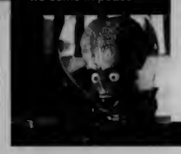
Vaughn gets brought back to his roots by Nicki, his new love, who teaches him to be the Wild Thing again.

Willie "Mays" Hayes comes back as a star and a power hitter, which is what Brown doesn't want out of his lead–off hitter. But he, too, works through the problem during the course of the season. Hayes also comes back not in the form of Wesley Snipes, but as Omar Epps. Although Epps did a solid job, one has to question the thought process of a baseball movie not replacing the character through free agency, trade or retirement of some sort. But Epps did do a good job as a replacement Hayes.

Then there is Bernson, who returns as Roger Dorn, but this time he buys the team from Phelps, only to sell it back to her when he runs out of money mid–way though the season. Then he plays in the big game when they need to win. He pinch–hits, only to take a pitch in the back and get a runner on.

Jake Taylor returns, but as a catcher for half the year and then as an assistant coach for the second half — including the big game when Brown is in the hospital recovering from a heart attack. He helps the new catcher Rube Baker, who has a problem with getting the ball back to the pitchers mound. Taylor has him remember the Playboy models and he does fine.

Baker also gives the inspirational speech during the mid–season when the team is at a turning point saying, "Gosh darnit, boys, this is the Major Leagues. I don't know about you but I've been waiting my whole life to get here." Cerano returns as a more mild–mannered slugger who loves everybody and everything, but is helped through that problem by Tonaka who says he has no "cosongas." Again, Phelps' plans to relocate the team are ruined.



The Indians also lose Jack Parker, who was their off–season acquisition, as he's traded mid–season during the team's financial woes. The Indians eventually beat Parker and the White Sox in the ALCS.

Finally, just a word on Major League III. First, it's not about the Indians or basically anything to do with the first two films and the star is Scott Bakula. Can you say "Quantum Leap"? That's what this movie is — a stretch. It's terrible, not even worth the $3 to rent on a slow night at UMass.

If you feel like predictable baseball movies that make you feel good and the song "Wild Thing," then Major League I & II are good for you to watch over and over again. Dare I say they're classics.

one of us had heart out there, and it wasn't just me it was everyone. The hustle and... any time anyone got a check out there it showed how much we wanted that ball," DePaula said. "Francesca really told us at halftime how important it was for us to get our confidence back and to really play well as a team, and this team really played together awesome today."

But the play of the bench will be key in the future success during the remainder of the Minutewomen's season.

"We go into each game not knowing who is going to start, and it's really who works their butt off in practice and we really practice hard, and it shows by everybody who goes on the field. It doesn't matter if you're the first off the bench or last off the bench you have to do your job," DePaula said.

Unser and child both trying to recover at home

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) — One of the things Al Unser Jr. has in common with his daughter, Cody, these days is they're both in wheelchairs.

The race car driver knows he's in his temporarily. He's hoping that will be the case for his 12–year–old daughter too.

Unser is recovering from injuries suffered in a race in Florida last month, while his daughter is battling transverse–myelitis, a disorder that has left her paralyzed from the chest down.

The problem occurs when nerve impulse transmission up and down the spinal cord is blocked.

Dad and daughter are both using wheelchairs these days to get around the Unser household and are also getting in some quality time together.

"He's teaching me wheelies," Cody said. "I'm teaching him how to get around in the house better."

Cody, a sixth–grader, was stricken while playing basketball in February.

She spent more than three weeks at the Barrow Neurological Institute in Phoenix before returning home.

Unser fractured both bones in his right ankle and sprained his left knee in the accident March 21 at Homestead, Fla.

He expects to be back in a race car by the end of the month.

The outlook for his daughter, who is undergoing treatment at Carrie Tingley Hospital in Albuquerque, is more uncertain.

"She's looking really healthy," Unser said. "She's really upbeat about everything and that's great."

Basketball remains a passion for Cody and the family has set up a miniature goal in the driveway of their Albuquerque home. Cody, her dad and 16–year–old brother, Alberi, have been playing wheelchair basketball.

"It's not the same," Cody said. "What I miss the most is playing basketball with my sixth–grade friends."

recovered a little bit better."

DePaula spearheaded the UMass resurgence with a goal and an assist to show for an aggressive overall performance. With 11:08 left in the game, the Saratoga Springs, N.Y. native and teammate Rachel Ingraffea cornered Hughes behind her own goal with a feverish double–team.

DePaula was awarded possession of the ball to start play with the Big Green netminder drastically out of position. Senior co–captain Laura Korutz capitalized on the open net by redirecting DePaula's subsequent pass without any Dartmouth competition.

"I think at the beginning of the game we came in knowing they were a No. 10 ranked team and we came out playing like that," DePaula said. "We dug a little ditch for ourselves but once we put one ball in the net we realized that we could play lacrosse, we knew we could beat them."

With the scoreboard eventually reading 9–6 in favor of Dartmouth, that one–minute barrage by the hosts early in the game started to weigh quite heavily.

The Big Green would finally make that minute a moot point, rattling off four more goals to end the game. Overall, the Minutewomen were left to ponder what would be if they could have avoided the book–end Dartmouth stretches that totalled eight points.

"We allowed them to go on a few runs — like right at the beginning, of the game, obviously — and right there toward the end of the game," McClellan said. "Had we gone into this game a little more confident or more intense we might have not had those runs and made it a tighter game. Certainly, it got tight there for a little while."

Also to note, Minutewoman Lynne Young solidified her standing as one of the best defenders in the Northeast by holding Dartmouth's Jacque Weitzel, who came into the game with 20 goals on the season, to only one point.

Massachusetts hopes to build off of yesterday's loss against LaSalle tomorrow. UMass will host the Explorers in the first–ever Atlantic 10 conference game for the Minutewomen.

with 26.2 innings under his belt. Szado leads the team with 30 Ks.

David Loonie (2-1) has allowed nine earned runs and has walked two. Nick Skirkanich's opponents are averaging just .224. The sophomore has allowed six earned runs while averaging about one strikeout per inning. Senior Bill Cooke, Santos, Brian Blumsack, Samelowicz have shown potential but have yet to compliment it with consistency.

So the problem does not lie in the talent. Though missing some major components from last year's Atlantic 10 East champion team, a young core remains and must step up. Yesterday's CCSU squad was not that much improved from March 20.

Currently UMass holds the No. 3 spot in the A-10 East race behind St. Joseph's and Temple, who both stand at 2-1. Facing Connecticut today, to whom they lost 14-20 last Monday, the Minutemen now need to iron out the wrinkles.

Tyson ready to open new record label

NEW YORK (AP) — Former heavyweight champion Mike Tyson is entering a new arena — the recording industry.

Tyson, who is serving a one-year prison sentence for assaulting two motorists, has signed a deal with Deflam records to create his own label. Tyson Records, the Daily News reported Tuesday.

Tyson Records will feature rap and rhythm-and-blues music and already has signed two artists — a 16-year-old pop singer named Doni and an 18-year-old named Centrell, the newspaper said.

Deflam's spokeswoman Dannyelle Burton had no comment on the report. Tyson's representative Shelley Finkel did not return a telephone call seeking comment.

Michael Williams, the general manager of Tyson Records, told the newspaper that the former boxer plans to participate fully in the label's activities, from signing acts to traveling with the artists on their promotional tours.

Deflam, which is owned by Seagram's Universal Music Group, represents such singing sensations as Jay-Z, DMX and Methodman.

Jockey may get prized trophy back

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) — More than two decades after his 1961 Kentucky Derby trophy was stolen from his home, jockey John Sellers may soon get his treasure back.

The engraved sterling silver trophy that Sellers won aboard Carry Back was among a dozen trophies stolen when his Monrovia, Calif., home was burglarized in 1978.

UMass women's tennis squad set to face Fairfield

By Jason Owens
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team travels to Fairfield University today for a match that holds important implications for a team looking towards the Atlantic 10 tournament.

"[Fairfield is a] very good small school with excellent top- to-bottom depth," UMass women's tennis coach Judy Dixon said.

The Stags recently beat a solid Colgate team (who UMass defeated in a match last weekend, 6-1) and presents a significant challenge for the Minutewomen.

"They don't really have a big star," Dixon said. "But they are fundamentally sound, and on the whole are extremely talented."

To battle that depth, Dixon has made some adjustments to her usual match lineup, moving Junior Ola Gerasimova, who generally plays in the number-one singles slot, to the second singles position. Helena Horak, who has beaten Fairfield's number-one singles player in a previous match, will play at number one.

The move is an attempt to spread the Minutewomen's talent evenly to counteract Fairfield's balance.

"The two, three and four spots is where we need to combat their strength," Dixon said. "We are very strong at the five and six slots with Robin [Lebovitz] and Allie [Tross], so I feel good about that aspect of the match."

According to Dixon, UMass matches up well with Fairfield in doubles play. Gerasimova and Horak will play together as the No. 1 doubles team. Gillian Kane and Lebovitz, who two weeks ago dominated St. Bonaventure from the third doubles slot, are also expected to fare well.

"We've been playing solid [in doubles play]," Dixon said. "We're probably a little more aggressive [than Fairfield] and make less unforced errors."

Fairfield seems to come along at the perfect time for a Minutewomen squad that is truly beginning to round into form. After a hard winter season filled with highly-ranked Ivy League opponents of superior quality, Fairfield represents a team UMass is expected to beat, but should still present a challenge for the team nevertheless.

"It's really a good match for us to be playing," Dixon said. "It's coming at a good time in the season for us."

The Minutewomen will be well-rested for the match. Dixon gave the team four days off last week with the intention of resting the players' legs and minds. Including this one, the team has four matches to go before the A-10 tourney, with each one becoming more important than the last.

Overall, Dixon is well aware of her team's situation.

"We have to realize that each match is one step closer to the tournament," she said. "Right now we're healthy, we're favored for this match, but we'll have to play well to win. The team seems eager and ready."

WNBA may face the same fate as their male mates

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

By the weekend, we will have a pretty good indication whether women athletes and administrators are as pig-headed as their male counterparts.

The WNBA has set a Saturday deadline for its player's union to reach agreement on a new contract — or else.

Commissioner Val Ackerman would not provide specifics about what "or else" meant — "I can't discuss our options," she said Tuesday — but with the start of training camps only a month away, locking out the players is certainly at the top of a very short list.

Left unsaid was an even greater threat, that more than a dozen women's leagues have gone under in the past 20 years or so. The most recent casualty was the ABL, which was forced to close up shop three days before Christmas, just after tipping off what would have been its third season.

Most people would agree there has to be enough business for the bosses and the workers to begin bickering about how to cut it up, but even that point is in contention in the WNBA labor dispute. Ackerman said the mere fact there's an argument proves only that the league is on its way to becoming a business, not that it's arrived.

"We look upon it as a rite of passage," she said. "We said in the beginning we want to be major league. Unions are an accouterment of major league sports. To that extent, it's not a surprise we're in bargaining. I guess we're on the fast track. I think bargaining can and should be a constructive process to anticipate concerns."

The players, on the other hand, think it's well past the time for anticipating concerns. They want those concerns addressed now.

"Loyalty is a two-way street," WNBA Players' Association spokeswoman Pam Wheeler said. "The players have shown themselves willing to sacrifice in order to build the league. They were loyal and now they expect some loyalty in return."

Like every set of negotiations between players and owners, it would require more space than is available here to present the arguments for either side. Suffice it to say that just like every set of negotiations, it's about money.

The union wants the minimum salary raised from $15,000 to $45,000, a cut of merchandising sales, retirement benefits and the right to challenge disciplinary action. The league counters that it is offering a 30 percent increase in salaries, year-round health, dental and maternity benefits and offseason career programs.

It pegs the compensation package on the table at $60,000 a player. Any time a movement begins to gain momentum, the way women's pro sports have in recent years, the debate intensifies over which direction to take next. Slow growth, or speed it up? Follow the model established by men's sports, or try to develop something better?

Making matters even more difficult in the current round of negotiations is the bitter taste left by the NBA lockout that pitted millionaire players against multi-millionaire owners and was resolved only after shrinking the regular season from 82 games to 50.

"That's the unfortunate part," Wheeler said, "that this had to come up right after the NBA trouble. But if people take just a minute to look at what's involved here, they'll see it's like comparing apples and oranges."

She makes a good point. The NBA players, with an average salary of more than $2 million, lost about $400 million in salaries while the bickering stretched out. The WNBA and its union are about $2 million apart — total. Depending on whose numbers you buy, the average player makes between $31,000 and $40,000.

The good news is that the talks so far have been characterized by both sides as cordial, marked by give and take. The bad news is that except for those involved or those with a direct stake in them, nobody could care less.

Women's pro basketball is still a fragile commodity that, noble intentions aside, will have to turn a profit sooner rather than later. Without seeing the books, it's hard to know which side to root for, but that's almost besides the point. This is one struggle neither side can afford to lose.

Even with the marketing muscle and operating expertise of the NBA behind it, the WNBA is far from established. Last year, it averaged crowds of 9,669 and a television rating hovering around 2.0. That's hardly enough to fight over for the time being. And if the league and the players do just that — fight — loudly or for very long, winning will hardly have been worth the effort.

Todd Samolewicz. The southpaw tossed five innings of one-hit baseball to earn his third win of the year.

"I felt real good today," said Samolewicz, who fanned seven CCSU batters. "It's nice when you can throw all three pitches for strikes, because then you have the edge over the batter."

Said Stone about his hurler: "Todd did a great job against their lefties. We knew that their better hitters were lefties. He did a great job of throwing strikes and he had his breaking ball going."

The Minutemen will now take to the field again this afternoon at 3 p.m. when they will face the University of Connecticut at Lorden Field. The Huskies beat UMass 20-14 in a slugfest last Tuesday in Storrs, Conn. Sophomore right-hander Nick Skirkanich will get the call against UConn this afternoon.

Let's get ready to rumble

The Massachusetts women's water polo team is ready to put its top 10 national ranking on the line this weekend.

Offerman still compared to Vaughn

Jen Cormier

The comparisons are inevitable. Every time Jose Offerman is introduced in the starting lineup, visions of Mo Vaughn will dance in fans' heads. Every time Offerman swings a bat or fields a ball, the Ghost of the Hit Dog will appear. The question is, what will it take for Offerman to be known as more than just "That guy who replaced Mo?"

Offerman is not even remotely similar to Vaughn. He is not a home run generator, he is not terribly outspoken, and as far as we know, he has yet to enjoy breakfast at the Foxy Lady. There is absolutely no basis for comparison between two players of such differing styles.

But the fact remains that when Vaughn left town, the signing of Offerman became another ring on the human dart board otherwise known as Dan Duquette. How, Duquette bashers asked, could the GM sign a no-name like Offerman as a successor to the Hit Dog's throne?

They scoffed at Offerman's seven homers last season, which paled in comparison to Vaughn's 40. Offerman was a marked man in this town from the second he signed his four-year, $26 million contract.

While Duquette's failure to entice big-name players is his biggest fault, there is no need to drag Offerman down with the Duke. It is unjustified and irrational to label Offerman as a mediocre player merely because he doesn't have the hitting power of Vaughn.

Unfortunately, the citizens of Red Sox Nation have never been known for their open-minded rationality. Whether this is fair or not, every single stat that Offerman puts up will be measured on the Mo Scale.

It is time for Sox fans to look past Offerman's home run numbers — face it, they will never be of Vaughn-like proportions. Instead of focusing on what Offerman can't do, look at what he can do.

Last season with the Kansas City Royals, Offerman had a career-high 45 steals. Keep in mind that stealing bases is something that Vaughn rarely did with the Sox. The ability to run is something the Sox lineup has lacked for quite some time. Compare Offerman's 45 steals with the 72 steals accumulated by the entire 1998 Red Sox team. Also, while he won't be giving Mark McGwire a run for his money, Offerman has the superb ability to get on base.

From the moment he adorned the Sox uniform, Offerman has worked hard to prove the skeptics wrong. He had a strong spring, hitting .257 with a team-leading 16 RBIs. In the season opener against his former team, Offerman went 4-for-5 in the leadoff spot, smacking two singles, a double and a triple, scoring two runs and stealing a base. How's that for a dazzling debut?

Still, Offerman has a long road ahead of him. It will take more than a good game or a good series to make the fans forget Vaughn. This will be the season of judgment for Offerman.

Expectations are high in Boston — Sox ace Pedro Martinez can attest to that. It was just last season that Martinez found himself in a similar situation, constantly facing comparisons with Roger Clemens. As a result of intense media and fan scrutiny, Martinez battled nerves and jitters throughout the season.

Offerman's situation may prove to be even more nerve- wracking. When Martinez was acquired last year, fans had already had a season to adjust to the loss of Clemens. Also, Martinez was an established pitcher coming off a Cy Young season. This season, with many fans still fuming over the recent Vaughn fiasco, Red Sox fans may show no mercy to Offerman.

Whether Offerman can withstand the pressure of comparisons with Vaughn remains to be seen. Already, Offerman seems visibly perturbed at the mere mention of Vaughn's name. He cringes at the notion that he was signed as Vaughn's replacement and repeatedly has said that "we are two different players." Even the Hit Dog himself made a plea to Hub fans to refrain from directing their rage at Offerman.

Offerman certainly has a heavy burden on his shoulders. In addition to dealing with the Vaughn situation, Offerman needs to find a niche in the infield. Throughout spring training, manager Jimy Williams tested Offerman at first and second, but went with Mike Stanley and Jeff Frye, respectively, for the season opener. If Offerman remains as designated hitter, Duquette will come under more fire for paying $26 million to a man with no place on defense — and Offerman will face even more heat from the fans.

Regardless of whether Offerman has the strength to rise up to the challenge, the situation should provide fans with some classic Red Sox drama. Calendars are already marked for Vaughn's May 7 return to Fenway with the Anaheim Angels, and there is always the great possibility that Boston could host an All-Star game with Clemens as the A.L. starting pitcher and Vaughn as the starting first baseman.

Meanwhile, Offerman will continue his struggle to emerge from the shadows of Mighty Mo's legacy.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You will have to be patient today while serving the needs of others, but when it is your turn to have others tend to you, you'll have a field day!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Make your feelings known as soon as you are aware of them today and you'll enjoy no end of benefits as a result of such openness and honesty.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Focus on details today, but don't neglect to step back now and then to take in the big picture. Ultimately, it's the "whole" that really counts.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Thanks to your ability to change your mind on cue, you'll have what it takes to accomplish more today than anyone else in the same position.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be asked to believe in all sorts of things that aren't really happening, but your imagination will surely see you through. Avoid tension.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You can be your own worst enemy yet again today, but with the help of a friend, you can avoid doing the same old things that routinely hold you back.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Take care that you don't allow your own instinctive responses to threats intrude on what you really want to do. Control yourself at all times.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You should be able to learn to do certain things that don't come naturally, but today you're likely to have a devil of a time. Be patient!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You'll be surprised to learn that someone quite different from you has a great many similarities, too! This may be the time to work together.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — A rival is likely to impress you with the depth of his or her commitment. You are on the verge of something that may indeed change your life.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You'll discover the truth in a situation that enables you to address a certain problem in a new way. Others are likely to follow your lead.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may be surprised to discover that you are actually doing better than you had supposed. Your definition of success is changing.

Detroit is again the favorite to claim the Cup

Last week in this column, my colleague and fellow NHL columnist (who shall remain nameless) picked the Colorado Avalanche to win the Stanley Cup, despite the fact that the Detroit Red Wings acquired the most talent at the trade deadline three weeks ago.

Well, going into last night's game with Vancouver, the two-time defending Stanley Cup champions had rung off a season-high seven straight wins and have clinched the third seed in the Western Conference playoffs.

James Murphy on the NHL

Before the March 23 trade deadline, the Red Wings were in serious danger of falling into the fifth seed, as St. Louis had slowly crept back into contention for the Central Division lead, trailing Detroit by only five points. Fans in Motown were nervous that the Wings two-year reign as champs was over.

Well, the acquisitions of Wendel Clark, Chris Chelios and Bill Ranford have brought Cup mania back to Motown. Clark has seven goals in seven games. Chelios has a few assists and has been a much needed physical presence behind the blue line and Ranford has two wins in two relief appearances for Chris Osgood.

Can you say three-peat?

The Wings have just too many weapons for anyone, even the Avalanche, to knock them off in the playoffs. I agree with my colleague that the Avs' pose a serious challenge and that if the two teams meet, they will provide hockey with an incredible series. In fact, I believe the Red Wings will win the Western Conference Finals in seven over the Avs'.

Detroit will then face–off against the Toronto Maple Leafs, their long time arch–nemesis in the finals and beat the Leafs in seven also, grabbing their third straight championship.

Clark will score the game–winner against the team he started with, and he will do it in the Molson Centre, in front of his old fans. In the press conference, he will dedicate the goal to Maple Leaf Gardens, saying the old barn should never have been torn down.

• The Flyers have somehow found themselves under the infamous "Boston Sports Curse." You know, the one that causes freak injuries, whining players, bad trades, cocaine addictions, death and just bad luck in general. All of these B.S.C. qualities, with the exception of the cocaine addictions and death, have worked their way south to the First Union Center (god, I hate corporate names for arenas) and fallen on the once–mighty Flyers.

First the Flyers' top defenseman Eric Desjardins went down with a torn ACL. Then Mark Recchi got knocked out with post–concussion syndrome, and as if that wasn't enough, John LeClair has missed a few games from a nagging back injury. So in response to all these injuries the Flyers traded for Steve Duchesne and Craig Berube. Duchesne is one of the most under–achieving players in the league right now and Berube, well he is just another goon. Sound familiar Boston fans?

The biggest news from the B.S.C.'s visit to Philly, though, was Eric Lindros' collapsed lung. Collapsed lung you ask? Freak injury!

As of yesterday, Lindros was still lying in a Nashville hospital, after having a tube removed from his lung. The tube was there to drain out blood and fluid that had clogged his lung and caused it to collapse. The team doctor is saying that the Flyer captain still has a chance to make it back for the second round of the playoffs, but every other doctor who has examined him says his season is over. Many of these doctors even believe that if Lindros had bordered the team's scheduled flight out of Nashville last Thursday, instead of staying an extra night to go out on the town, he could have died because of the change in air pressure.

Here's a suggestion to Flyer management: Feel lucky he is alive and give him a holiday. You're not making it past the first round anyway.

• On a brighter note, how about the recent play of the Boston Bruins? A month ago the B's were in danger of missing the playoffs, and going into last night's battle with Florida, the Bruins needed one win to clinch a playoff berth. Byron Dafoe, who my colleague had referred to as a "bum," has a league–leading 10 shutouts.

Pat Burns should definitely be considered for Coach Of The Year again. Despite the tight wallet Bruins management possesses, Burns has once again made the best of what he has been given and might even have his team draw a fifth seed in the playoffs.

UM baseball beats Blue Devils, 8–6

Samolewicz tosses five shutout innings to earn the victory

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Heading into yesterday's game with Central Connecticut State University, Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone was well aware that his team could not assume an easy victory before it even took to the diamond.

Even though the Minutemen had totally dominated the Blue Devils in a 17–0 rout on March 20, Stone expected CCSU to be a much improved team this time around — and he turned out to be exactly right.

The Minutemen trailed 1–0 and 6–4 against the Blue Devils before eventually rallying for two runs in the fifth inning and two more in the eighth to squeak out an 8–6 victory yesterday afternoon at Earl Lorden Field.

"It always is [a different game the next time around]. You can't figure that you are going to beat a team 17–0 every time," Stone said. "We made things awful tough on ourselves today."

UMass (11–10, 1–2 in the Atlantic 10) played solid fundamental baseball in the winning eighth–inning surge. Nick Gorneault led off the frame with a single, and moved to second base on a sacrifice bunt by senior co–captain Seth Kaplan. However when CCSU first baseman John Mayette bobbled Kaplan's bunt, both runners ended up reaching base safely.

Sophomore Nate Lang followed Kaplan by first failing to sacrifice the runners up 90 feet. Nevertheless, the UMass first baseman still got the job done when he chopped to shortstop with the runners in motion to push Gorneault and Kaplan up a base.

UMass took the lead for good when Blue Devils pitcher Scott Martin unleashed a wild pitch which allowed Gorneault to score. Shaun Skeffington then followed that up with a bloop RBI double that plated Kaplan and made it 8–6 in favor of the hosts.

"Even today we were up and down," Stone said. "We've got be able to execute on offense."

CCSU (10–12–1) opened the scoring in the top of the first thanks to some wildness from UMass starter Jesse Santos. The freshman right–hander, who was making his first collegiate start, gave up a one–out double to Billy Thomes before issuing a walk and plunking Shawn Dreyer. Thomes would then come home on a walk to CCSU left–fielder Pete Fontana.

The Minutemen would then strike for four runs in the second inning, highlighted by an RBI single by freshman Aaron Senez, and a two–run single by Skeffington, who had three RBIs on the afternoon.

However, the visitors came right back in their next at–bat, scoring three times to knot the game at 4–4. Thomes started the rally with a solo home run, while an error by Senez allowed two more runs to cross the plate.

CCSU then went ahead in the fourth and ended Santos' day in the process. Two walks and a single loaded the bases for Dreyer, who laced a bullet at UMass third baseman Bryan Mazzaferro. The ball, though, went right through the wickets of the senior, and two runs scored on the play to give the Blue Devils a 6–4 lead.

UMass would then tie the game in the fifth inning thanks to a CCSU error and an RBI double by Gorneault.

From that point on, CCSU was held in check offensively thanks to a stellar relief appearance from junior

Brian Samela had two hits yesterday afternoon in an 8–6 win over Central Connecticut State University.

Now is the time for UM baseball to put all components together

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

You never play the same team twice, even if that team is the same school with the same players during the same season.

Yesterday the Massachusetts baseball team beat Central Connecticut State University 8–6 at Earl Lorden Field. On March 20 the Minutemen were in Florida for spring break and downed the Blue Devils by a score of 17–0. Was it the weather, the pitching or the field?

"It was a different atmosphere this time," freshman Jesse Santos said. "We were kind of laid back here."

In Florida, UMass snapped CCSU's five–game winning streak to keep their own running at five. After losing the first six games of the season, the Minutemen finally seemed to be responding with some consistency. However, it would not last.

Though UMass is just over the .500 mark at 11–10 (1–2 Atlantic 10), they can't seem to gel together solid offense and defense every game.

"We made things awful tough on ourselves," Coach Mike Stone said. "Even [today] we were up and down."

Santos earned his first collegiate start though the Chelmsford native struggled through four innings, letting up six runs off five hits while walking four. The strike zone was tight and at times it seemed that the home plate umpire squeezed the strings a little too tight.

"I felt good, though kind of erratic," Santos said. "He wasn't consistent. Some of my curve balls [that he called balls] seemed to be right there."

Todd Samolewicz relieved Santos in the fifth inning and did not allow a run the rest of game. The left–hander recorded seven Ks and gave away just one free ride along with a single hit.

However, the battery struggled with only two extra base hits while sitting five times and stranding seven base runners. Despite three Blue Devil errors, the Minutemen couldn't capitalize and were held scoreless for five innings. But the potential is there.

Prior to yesterday's game, the Minutemen were hitting .316 as a team with 58 extra base hits including 13 home runs. Freshman Mike Kulak, this week's WHMP/WMUA UMass Athlete of the Week, owns a monstrous .409 batting average with a slugging percentage of .727 (prior to yesterday). Senior Aaron Braunstein has knocked in 21 RBIs while slugging .526. Freshman Chris Morgan, Scott Anderson and senior Bryan Mazzaferro have come through in clutch situations this season. Brian Samela has raised his average to .277 (prior to yesterday) while driving in 14 RBIs with two home runs.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Jesse Santos

Defensively, UMass has settled into a comfortable rotation with Stone designating some starters and other players rotating during games. Yesterday, the Minutemen committed three errors but possess a fielding percentage of .944.

The pitching rotation has been well used. Travis Veracka (1–2) has logged the most hours with 27.2 innings pitched. Veracka has struck out 21 while allowing a team–high 42 hits while walking just nine hitters. Sophomore Craig Szado (1–2) is right behind Veracka

Dartmouth downs UM with big scoring spurts

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

HANOVER, N.H. — One minute out of 40. Aside from 60 short seconds, yesterday's game between the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team and No. 10 Dartmouth was a neck–and–neck battle.

When the clock read 26:09 in the opening half, the hosting Big Green (5–1, 3–0 Ivy League) scored their first goal — one of four by junior Kate Graw — to take a 1–0 advantage. By the 25:12 mark, the Dartmouth lead had reached four, and UMass (4–4) had yet to get on the scoreboard in a game that would end with the score 13–6 in favor of the home team.

Freshman midfielder Alison Moulin became the fifth different Green player to notch a goal, upping the lead to 5–0 with 21:15 left in the first half, followed by two additional Dartmouth scores by sophomore Liz Merrit and Graw to inflate the seemingly unsurmountable lead even further.

The Minutewomen could only tally one goal before halftime, as two hobbling UMass players combined to cut the Dartmouth lead to 7–1 with 8:21 to go. Junior Sara MacNabb, who played through two tibia stress fractures, scored off of an assist by classmate Stephanie Pavlick, who endured an ankle injury to appear in the matchup.

By the time the squad collected for the break, Massachusetts was looking at the down side of an 8–1 score.

When the second half began, the Minutewomen began to slice into the Big Green lead. Sophomore Kara DePaula put her second career goal past Dartmouth goaltender Sarah Hughes to double the UMass output.

Four minutes later, MacNabb collected her second point of the game by firing the ball into the Green net to make the score 8–3.

After another strike by Graw, the Minutewomen went on a 3–0 run over the course of roughly three minutes.

"I think we did some really nice things. We regained composure when in games past when we dug a pit we never recovered," UMass Coach McClellan said. "I think we

Mass bench plays well in loss; bench will be key to battle injuries

By Paul Teves

HANOVER, N.H. — With the rash of injuries to the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, the bench will have to play a huge role in the success of the team as it enters its Atlantic 10 conference schedule.

The Minutewomen (4–4) received good signs from their bench despite losing a 13–6 decision to No. 10 Dartmouth (5–1) yesterday afternoon.

Entering the game, the Minutewomen seemed dreadfully overmatched considering they had been struggling against ranked opponents. They were also without the services of three of their key players, and were limited by injuries to four other players who played anyway.

The Minutewomen were without the services of junior defender Colleen Wales, who had surgery to repair an ACL injury; sophomore defender Shalee Merkle, who will also be out the remainder of the season with an ACL injury; and sophomore attack Fay Naber, who was out due to family reasons.

The Minutewomen also used the services of four injured but playing team members yesterday. Junior midfielder Sara MacNabb continues to play despite tibia stress fractures in both her legs. Junior midfielder Stephanie Pavlick played sparingly with an injured ankle. Sophomore midfielder Eileen Currier was used in a limited role in the game due to a stress fracture of her own. And finally, goalie Tara Durkin might still be feeling the affects of a mild concussion suffered during the Hofstra game on Friday.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Kara DePaula

With the laundry list of injuries the Minutewomen have to deal with, they will need the play of their bench along with the play of their remaining starters to carry the team in the coming weeks in order to make an impact in the A–10.

"We had some great performances from some bench kids, Kara DePaula had some just brilliant plays," coach Francesca McClellan said. "I think they can contribute. Neale can come in and do something. I'm not worried about our bench. Today the bench did step up."

Although the Minutewomen seemed shaken at the beginning of their game with the Dartmouth powerhouse, they were able to recover, and much of the play was done by their bench and the walking wounded.

After falling behind 7–0 with 17:22 remaining in the first half, the Minutewomen would regain their focus and match the powerful Big Green the rest of the way.

They were started off by a goal from MacNabb as she buried a shot on a free position pass from Pavlick to pull the game to 7–1.

The Minutewomen would feel the power of their bench just after half–time. UMass held the Big Green at bay, keeping the score 8–1 as it was at half–time until Kara DePaula came off the bench and, through a great individual effort, darted through the defense to net her second career goal, making the score 8–2.

DePaula continue her onslaught following goals by both UMass and Dartmouth. She put on the pressure, battling Dartmouth's goalie Sarah Hughes behind the net, and won the ball. DePaula then passed the ball to a wide open Laura Koruz, who netted an empty–cage goal to bring UMass to within five scores at 9–4.

The inspired play off the bench of DePaula and teammates Pam Neale and Christy Ambrose, seemed to re–energize the once not–confident Minutewomen — to the point that both Melissa Anderson and Rachel Ingraffea each scored a goal to pull to 9–6 with 7:29 remaining in the game, before Dartmouth pulled away to cement the victory.

"It was really all about heart, every

Court aims to build trust in UM's pending affirmative action decisions

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Dialogue was the tool of choice yesterday afternoon as trustees, students and staff met to work on what could be a difficult construction project at the University of Massachusetts, building trust around the admissions issue.

"No promises were made or contracts were signed and that wasn't the intention [of the meeting]," said Student Trustee Elly Court. "I was feeling that the students may be starting to trust the process and the people involved."

"I'd heard from elected student leaders somehow the campus student body felt maybe the trustees were not supportive. That maybe this thing happened because the trustees are too conservative... I felt it was important to come here as many times as necessary to show the students that we are with Chancellor Scott and with them," said Bob Karam, chairman of the Board of Trustees.

The intention of the meeting was, said Court, who organized it, to increase trust between students and the trustees and find concrete ways to help the issue.

But former SGA president Saiwa Shamapande, said trust is hard to build after past experiences.

"We could be taken advantage of. We are left to trust a lot of people... Before, we trusted the people on campus and now they're the people we're fighting," he said.

"I think it went extremely well. It's a continuation of the dialogue established a couple of weeks ago," said Ricardo Townes, assistant vice–chancellor for Campus Activities.

Townes said that while Karam was careful not to "micro– manage or interject himself in the situation," he listened to students concerns.

A primary concern Townes said students raised was about Chancellor David K. Scott's task force that will be looking for ways to increase the recruitment and retention of Asian, Latino, African, Native American (ALANA) students within the framework of the recently changed admissions policy which reduces the significance of race in admissions.

Students concerns included, Townes said, how many students and faculty would be on the task force and who will be choosing the task force's members.

Court said she will be negotiating with Scott to see if students can be given some financial support so they will be able to stay over the summer to work on the task force.

But faculty involvement was on Townes mind. He said Karam agreed with him that faculty need to be mobilized early to ensure they're on the task force over the summer.

The group will be expected to have a report of their progress ready for Karam by September. Court said, "Bob is impassioned and committed. If they don't progress and the task force stagnates, I have confidence he will react appropriately," she said.

"Karam is definitely our man. This is the first time a trustee has given us the commitment. We are actually talking in the same language," said Njeri Thelwell, a post–graduate student who attended the meeting.

Also to increase ALANA student yields, Court said students are being sought to work on a phone bank, calling accepted ALANA applicants. Javier Cevallos, interim vice– chancellor for Student Affairs will be coordinating student volunteers for the phone bank.

Townes said SGA President Jeff Howe, who attended the meeting, met earlier in the day with Scott and the Chancellor's Executive Advisory Council over the issue.

"He was good," Townes said. "He was feisty."

Cultural Center to be re-opened today

Yuri–Kochiyama will be present for the re–opening of her honorary Yuri–Kochiyama Cultural Center, sponsored by the Asian American Student Association, taking place at 3 p.m. today.

After a dedication ceremony at 3 p.m. in the Cultural Center in Worcester Dining Hall, Kochiyama will be a guest lecturer at 7 p.m. in Mahar Auditorium as part of the Asian Latina African Native American lecture series today. Carmela Makabali, chair of AASA, feels that it is "nice to honor someone while they are still living," considering Kochiyama is 78 years old.

Kochiyama's life has been committed to building bridges between Asian, African and Puerto Rican communities through her revolutionary ideas, fight for human rights, and love for mankind.

She was born in California in 1921 to a Japanese fishing family and her father was falsely accused and detained for spying after the Pearl Harbor bombings. He died just days after his release. The rest of her family was then incarcerated at the Jerome concentration camp.

In New York during the 1950s Kochiyama's family hosted open houses to spread knowledge about civil rights. In the 1960s, she and her family moved to Harlem and protested for equal education and rights for black and Puerto Rican workers. She later met and befriended Malcolm X. Though she did not agree with his anti–integration ideas at first, she later found common threads in their struggles. Kochiyama was the person who cradled Malcolm X after his assassination.

From the 1970s to the present, Kochiyama has worked to free political prisoners (similar to her father), on several legal defense committees with revolutionary nationalist organizations and has joined political study groups to advocate her ideas. Kochiyama will also be speaking at an Asian Night on Friday, April 9, in the Campus Center Auditorium at 7 p.m.

Pulitzer–winner Wright reads at UMass

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

Last night Pulitzer Prize–winning poet Charles Wright read a selection of his poems to a packed room full of listeners at Memorial Hall.

Wright, a professor at the University of Virginia, won the Pulitzer Prize last year for Black Zodiac. He spoke with a hint of his native Tennessee in his voice, as he read poems primarily from his book Appalachia.

The reading was sponsored by the UMass Arts Council and the MFA Program in Creative Writing.

English professor Dara Wier introduced the poet, saying his work "amazed, alarmed, consoled, delighted." She went on to describe his work with words from one of his own poems: "Sharp as angel's teeth."

The fact that he won the Pulitzer Prize was secondary to the department, Wier said afterward. His winning the prize "was pure pleasure for us," she said.

"We respect and love his poetry."

Wright read for about 30 minutes. He started by pausing for a moment, then commented how, when he was young, he paused because he "used to have a terrible stutter." He then mumbled that he hoped "the Yankees lose again [tonight]."

Afterward, those in attendance spoke highly of the poet and his work.

"It was pretty satisfying," said Alex Phillips, a senior English major who is in a workshop with Professor Wier.

"It was nice to hear the southern accent mouth those phrases."

"This was my first reading," said Leanne Hayes, a senior sociology major. "I thought it was interesting. He has a great sense of humor."

Adam Segal, who is an undecided freshman at Amherst College, was drawn in after seeing posters around town.

Wright is "almost a throwback," Segal said.

"He's a lot different than most modern poets."

"It's terrifying, of course," Wright said, a bit jokingly, about reading his poetry in front of an audience. "Writing it is a layer by layer. Speaking is supposed to be seamless."

Others went on to explain why bringing such artists to campus is so important.

Rob Casper, a creative writing teacher in the MFA program, explained the experience of seeing a poet live, especially for his students: "Poetry is more an experience than an assignment.

"It's great to see the students feel the electricity" of the live reading, Casper said. "My students heard things."

To see poetry live, said Phillips, is "essential for undergraduates and graduates. It's the lifeblood. It's what get's you excited about writing. These are as important as the classes.

"He's the only poet we could get this semester. And that's tragic," he went on to say.

"We should have these things weekly, bi–weekly."

"It's really important to hear it firsthand," Hayes said.

Wier expressed gratitude that Wright spoke on–campus.

"We're grateful that the UMass Arts Council understands our need to bring poets [to campus] that wouldn't ordinarily be here."

Judge quiets squabbling lawyers in Shepard case

LARAMIE, Wyo. (AP) – A judge slapped a gag order Thursday on lawyers involved in the Matthew Shepard murder trial, saying they "gravely injured" the defendant's right to a fair trial. "There exists a very real danger that counsel's playing to the media has already gravely injured, or at least made much more difficult, the prospect of seating a jury in this case," Judge Barton R. Voigt wrote.

Voigt's ruling stemmed from a dispute between lawyers Representing Aaron McKinney and Russell Henderson.

Henderson has pleaded guilty to murder and kidnapping in the death of Shepard, a University of Wyoming student who was lured from a bar in October and beaten to death. He received two life sentences.

Henderson admitted driving Shepard to a remote area and tying him to a fence, but said he tried to intervene to prevent McKinney from inflicting a more severe beating. McKinney, who has yet to be tried, then struck Henderson in the face, said Henderson.

McKinney's attorney, Dion Custis, told reporters Henderson fabricated the story to save himself from the death penalty. Henderson's public defender Wyatt Skaggs then publicized copies of allegedly incriminating letters supposedly written by McKinney, drawing another round of criticism from Custis.

"We would like to see the servicemen released because they never should have been detained in the first place," Clinton said during a news conference with Chinese Premier Zhu Rongji.

Vice President Al Gore, campaigning in Iowa, said the bombing would continue, adding "Milosevic knows what he has to do to bring this to a conclusion."

Yugoslavia claims Kosovo attack over, refugees return to province

By George Jahn
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Yugoslavia urged refugees to return home yesterday, declaring "peace has prevailed in Kosovo" and saying its 14–month war against ethnic Albanian separatists was over. But Western officials feared those same refugees would be used as human shields against NATO attacks.

As the United States pledged that NATO will press ahead with the bombing campaign against Yugoslavia, a former Cypriot president arrived in Belgrade to try to win freedom for three captured U.S. soldiers. His task could prove difficult: a hard–line Serbian vice premier ruled out any release as long as the NATO bombardment continued.

On the 16th day of the U.S.–led air assault, hopes for the prisoners' release were mixed with concern over thousands of ethnic Albanian refugees whose fate was unknown a day after Yugoslavia sealed off its borders and stopped their flight out of Kosovo. The Yugoslav government, which says it is observing a unilateral cease–fire in Kosovo since Tuesday for Orthodox Easter, claimed the refugees were voluntarily heading back to their homes in the province.

As night fell yesterday, several thousand people chanting "Yugoslavia! Yugoslavia!" gathered on two major bridges in Belgrade and the remaining Danube River bridge in the city of Novi Sad to serve as volunteer "human shields" against NATO attacks. Shortly after 10 p.m., air–raid sirens sounded in Belgrade. Spyros Kyprianou, currently the speaker of the Cypriot parliament, said he planned to meet Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic today and that the Americans might be freed during the long Orthodox Easter weekend. He called on NATO to reciprocate with a cease–fire over the holiday, something the alliance has refused.

Vice Premier Vojislav Seselj, leader of the influential Serbian Radical Party, told reporters yesterday that releasing the Americans was "out of the question."

U.S. State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said only an unconditional release would be acceptable. "Any attempt to use this as a bargaining chip is both illegal and immoral," he said. President Clinton insisted that NATO can still win in Kosovo without sending in ground troops, and expressed hope yesterday that the three servicemen would be freed.

World Trade Organization deal still eludes negotiators

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States and China failed to strike a final deal yesterday for clearing China's entry to the World Trade Organization but found accord on opening China's markets to some U.S. farm products and more airline flights.

Both President Clinton and Chinese Premier Zhu Rongji voiced optimism that an agreement for China joining the WTO can be reached before the end of this year.

Despite marathon negotiations over the past four days and a flurry of last–minute trade concessions from China, the administration decided it needed more than Chinese negotiators were willing to offer to sell the trade package to a hostile Congress. The failure to clinch a final agreement was a significant setback for Zhu, the first Chinese premier to visit America in 15 years. He had hoped to win U.S. backing for China's entry into WTO during his meetings with Clinton.

"We made significant progress toward bringing China into the World Trade Organization on fair commercial terms, but we are not there yet," Clinton told reporters at a joint news conference with Zhu.

Clinton hailed separate deals for eliminating significant Chinese barriers to American agriculture products, including beef, pork, poultry, citrus and wheat grown in the Pacific Northwest. Other signed agreements included doubling the number of passenger and cargo flights between the two countries. And the administration got a commitment from China to crack down on piracy of computer programs by Chinese government agencies.

The two countries also issued a joint statement listing trade concessions that China offered in hopes of winning America's support for WTO membership and pledged to continue working toward achieving that goal by November, when the WTO is scheduled to launch a new round of global trade talks in Seattle.

The joint statement, however, also listed areas still in dispute, most notably an American demand that China still be subject to unilateral U.S. trade sanctions for a period of years after it enters the WTO.

The administration was unwilling to relent on this point, fearing charges from opponents that it had given its enforcement rights for forcing China to comply with its commitments.

University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott announced at yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting that the university has taken three new initiatives to increase minority enrollment.

The initiatives come in conjunction with the chancellor's recent revisions to the admissions policy which now make race one of many factors instead of a priority in admissions considerations.

The first of these initiatives is an attempt to persuade minority students who have already been accepted to the University to attend. Approximately 70 faculty members have been contacting these students by phone over the past week to try to convince them to enroll. Scott announced that the University will be holding a "student phone-a-thon," in which current students would also try to persuade accepted students to attend the University.

The University of California–Berkeley, which was forced several years ago by voter referendum to discontinue race–based admissions policies, recently announced that it was able to return to its previous level of minority enrollment using similar tactics.

The second of these initiatives is the formation of a "retention group," which Scott said would look at "what would be needed to improve the retention of students at the University in total, but also to improve the retention of ALANA students."

His final initiative is a task force made up of students, faculty and staff. The task force, Scott said, "would start planning for how we can do some new things in our whole admissions process for Fall 2000 in order to try to move back towards recruiting a student body with the diversity of graduating student from high schools." Scott said that he expects the group to be formed by the end of next week.

Every day, on average, eight people die while waiting for organ donation.

Over 60,000 people are currently on organ donation waiting lists.

A group of 10 Chicopee middle–school students has decided to do something about it.

This Saturday, these seventh– and eighth–grade community activists will be staffing an organ donation information and registration booth at both the Worcester and Berkshire Dining halls, at 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. respectively.

These 10 Resources for Enrichment and Advancement in Chicopee (REACH) program students chose this subject as the topic of their assigned "Community Problem Research Project." The group has been working to raise awareness of the need for increased organ donation.

"We feel that the students and staff [of UMass] will be responsive to the serious deficiency of potential donors," said Dr. Irene Czerwiec, coordinator of the student project.

The group has already been successful in reaching its goals. The students have been chosen to represent the state of Massachusetts at the International Future Problem Solvers competition at the University of Michigan in June. The five–day event will feature Community Problem Solving Division teams from around the globe.

In the meantime, the goal of the students for Saturday is to both raise awareness of the need for organ donation and to recruit sorely needed new donors.

"This will be an excellent chance for the university and our K–12 public schools to work together to help the community," Czerwiec said.

Events happening thousands of miles away will be hitting close to home this month as Town Meeting is asked to support a "Resolution on Tibet."

Karma Dolma, a University of Massachusetts graduate student in the School of Education and spokesperson for the Tibetan Association of Western Massachusetts will be bringing the petition article before Town Meeting which begins April 28.

Dolma will be attending Monday's Select Board meeting to seek their support for the petition.

The petition is intended to "raise awarness about the Tibetan situation [and] of the Tibetan community in Western Massachusetts," Dolma said.

If Town Meeting passes the "Resolution on Tibet," Dolma hopes it will add to the national grassroots effort that will eventually lead to the U.S. congress enacting legislation that will affect economic trade with China as well affecting China's Most Favored Nation status.

"It's an issue of recognition of soldarity [and] support," Dolma said.

The primary issues before Town Meeting when voting on the "Resolution on Tibet," would be supporting human rights, protection of Tibet and recognition of the Tibetan culture and history, Dolma said.

passage for Kyprianou's flight, alliance warplanes and missiles struck before dawn Thursday in Belgrade and against government troops in Kosovo.

NATO also warned that Yugoslavia's state-run radio and television network could be one of its next targets.

"It has filled the airwaves with hate and with lies over the years and especially now. It is therefore a legitimate target," Air Commodore David Wilby told reporters at NATO headquarters. Alliance spokesman Jamie Shea said some Yugoslav television facilities already have been hit.

Air Marshal Sir John Day said NATO forces would "take every precaution" to make sure they avoid targets where refugees may be used as human shields.

"(Still), at the end of the day, the responsibility is Milosevic's," he said.

In a statement Thursday, Milosevic's government claimed that "peace has prevailed in Kosovo," and said its security forces had "ended the offensive, anti-terrorist activities" against the ethnic Albanian Kosovo Liberation Army, which has been fighting for independence.

"The Yugoslav government once again calls on all citizens of Kosovo not to leave their country, to live in harmony and cooperation, and in that way resist the bombs that kill regardless of nationality," the statement said.

Nearly a million ethnic Albanians have fled or were driven out of Kosovo since the NATO bombing campaign began March 24, unleashing Europe's greatest mass displacement in half a century. Those reaching refuge in neighboring states have described a systematic campaign of terror by Serb troops and police against ethnic Albanians, who made up 90 percent of the Serbian province's prewar population of 2 million people.

NATO allies have dismissed Yugoslavia's claims of a unilateral ceasefire, saying the bombing campaign will continue Milosevic allows the return of all refugees, withdraws all troops and accepts a peace plan for Kosovo.

It has been impossible to confirm whether the cease-fire has taken effect on the ground.

After targeting fuel depots, transport links and other infrastructure throughout Yugoslavia, Western officials say the latest wave of air attacks focused on Serb police and army units scattered in rural areas of Kosovo.

United States asks for talks with Libya for first time in 18 years

By Edith M. Lederer
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Eighteen years after breaking diplomatic relations, the United States has asked U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan to arrange face-to-face talks with Libya, U.S. officials said yesterday.

"We're willing to have such a meeting," said Peter Burleigh, the deputy U.S. ambassador, explaining that it would likely include Britain and would focus on the steps that Libya must take before U.N. sanctions can be lifted permanently.

Burleigh's request to Annan to arrange talks with Libya's U.N. Ambassador Abuzed Omar Dorda, first reported in The Boston Globe on yesterday, came about two weeks ago.

The U.S. initiative marks a significant change in Washington's attitude toward Libya following its handover Monday of two suspects in the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am jet, which triggered the suspension of U.N. sanctions imposed in 1992.

Nonetheless, the United States still considers Moammar Gadhafi's government a pariah state, suspected of terrorist activities. Washington refused to lift U.S. sanctions after the handover of the two Libyans for trial in the Netherlands under Scottish law, and Libya's U.S. assets remain frozen. Americans are also essentially banned from trading with Libya or traveling there.

Still, Washington's agreement to a meeting, which is expected to take place in the next few weeks, is an important step in ending Libya's isolation. A U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said a resumption of diplomatic relations, which were broken in 1981, would likely be raised at the talks.

Britain also broke diplomatic ties with Libya, in 1984. But Britain's U.N. Ambassador Jeremy Greenstock said that in recent months he has met frequently with the Libyan ambassador to clarify the U.S.-British offer last August to try the two Libyans in the Netherlands under Scottish law.

So a future meeting including the Americans and the secretary-general, while welcome, is "no big deal for me," Greenstock said, noting that Britain has already offered to resume consular relations with Libya.

The Security Council issued a statement yesterday welcoming the handover of the two Libyans, noting the automatic suspension of sanctions and expressing its "deep appreciation" to the governments of South Africa and Saudi Arabia for their help. Before the council considers lifting sanctions permanently, Annan must report within 90 days on Libya's compliance with other council demands — including Libya's renunciation of terrorism, its cooperation with the trial and its commitment to compensating victims' families if the two men are convicted.

MADISON, Wis. — A company is appealing a judge's ruling that a female employee sexually harassed two female coworkers by calling them names that included derogatory terms for female body parts.

The ruling was believed to be the first in the nation involving verbal sexual harassment between same-sex co-workers, an attorney in the case and a gay-rights group said yesterday.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that harassment can be illegal when the offender and victim are the same sex. That case, however, involved physical harassment.

The administrative law judge's ruling, made in January, stems from a complaint that two Ball-Foster Glass Container Co. workers filed with the state Equal Rights Division against the company in 1996.

Jayme Thiede and Marcia Graf, who work in the box shop at the company's Burlington plant, accused Ball-Foster of refusing to discipline a co-worker, Janet Koyen, for harassing them despite repeated complaints.

According to their complaint, Koyen repeatedly used abusive language that included words that also could have a sexual connotation.

State Administrative Law Judge Larry Jakubowski in Milwaukee ruled Jan. 11 that the women had been sexually harassed and ordered the company to pay them a total of $21,000 in legal fees.

Ball-Foster insists the women weren't sexually harassed because it involved an ongoing dispute that included little more than name-calling among co-workers.

"As rude and offensive as it might be for someone to walk in and call you a name, it's not against federal law," said Jeffrey Mallamad, an Indianapolis attorney for the Muncie, Ind.–based company.

Thiede and Graf still work at the plant. Koyen was fired in October 1996 after she was accused of sending a threatening letter to the plant nurse in an incident unrelated to Graf and Thiede's complaints.

None could immediately be reached for comment yesterday.

One dead, Turkish governor injured in bombing

HAKKARI, Turkey (AP) — A guerrilla detonated bombs strapped to his body in front of the car of the governor of a largely Kurdish town yesterday, killing the chauffeur, the Anatolia news agency reported.

Three people — Gov. Nihat Canpolat, the commander of the local paramilitary regiment and a bodyguard — were wounded in the suicide attack, which sent the governor's car bursting into flames in Yuksekova. The town is near Turkey's borders with Iraq and Iran.

The bomber was killed and Canpolat's driver died while being taken to a hospital. The paramilitary commander was in another car in front of Canpolat's vehicle, the governor said, quoted by Anatolia.

It was the second suicide bombing targeting a Turkish governor in the past four days. On Monday, a man believed to be a Kurdish rebel blew himself up outside the governor's office in Bingol, southeastern Turkey. A girl was killed in that attack.

Signing your life away

Bryan McAllister

I think that when foreigners think of Americans, they probably think of two things: cheap sex and Coke.

That seems to be all we're known for, and why not? That's freedom, baby. That's democracy in action. As Americans, we get access to tons of free, cool deals that people in other countries can only yearn for — that is, in between the times that we shoot at them and take their oil.

You may have been eating lunch last week, or at least thinking about eating lunch, or at the very least thinking, when you got one of these "Coke Cards" in the paper. Mysteriously, these cards looked like something your cousin Johnny made in seventh grade Home Ec class, except they were called "Johnny Cards".

You all know the deal. "Coke Cards" give you discounts on movies, music, other stuff, blah blah blah. Yay. We all know that Coke has taken over UMass. A Coke bottle is now the official mascot, and we're now called the "Cokemen," the DuBois library is being made into a giant Coke bottle and Chancellor Scott has now figured "People who hate Pepsi" into the admissions policy.

"It sounded cooler than affirmative action," I think he said.

The "Coke Card" is only the latest addition to a slew of cards, offers, deals and sweepstakes that are advertised for everyday, and I'm tired of it. My wallet is now bigger than me, and is ripping in all directions, especially the part that contains the money, which is bad because I like money.

I already have my driver's license, UCard, ATM card, library card, credit card, phone card, social security card, AT&T card, Blockbuster card, organ donor card, health care card, People Who Like Yahtzee Card and 'Hey, Aren't You My Real Dad?" card.

Enough already. Stop the insanity. Leave me alone. Get off my monkey. A penny saved is a penny earned. People in glass houses shouldn't throw stones.

My idea is, just have one card for everything. When you're born, you should just get a "Person Card," and then when you get a library account or a PIN number, it can all go on your "Person Card."

That way, you wouldn't have to remember all these numbers. Sometimes, when I go up to a bank teller, and they ask me for my password, I completely go blank. The amount of passwords, PIN numbers, and account numbers I have to remember is staggering. I can hardly remember my own age, which helps with senior discounts, but not with passwords.

"What's your password, sir?" they say.

"045–34–2232." — "That's way too many numbers."

"0609." — "Too few."

"937547." — "No."

"58754." — "Sorry."

"Forget it." — "Thank you for banking with us."

I love the computer and technology age and everything; I think it's good for the porn industry, but it sucks for the average college student. There are too many bills to pay, too many clubs to belong to, too many signatures to make.

I love the computer and technology age and everything; I think it's good for the porn industry, but it sucks for the average college student.

I sign my name away like there's no tomorrow. If I see an "X," I sign. What if I'm signing the wrong thing? What if I sign for something I don't want? In America, it's so easy to weave your way around the system, to create false identities and get away with scams. People around the country are rich simply because they were bored with "Judge Judy" one day and decided to be clever.

A friend of mine, for instance, scammed a computer store by working at said computer store and using his inside knowledge to take back items he never even bought. He made thousands of dollars at age 19. I hate him.

I think the biggest fear I have of America's commercial duping is signing my name away to something really dangerous, such as the Devil.

That's why I say, beware of this "Coke Card." You never know what's behind it. But I'll still drink Coke, because sometimes I get thirsty.

Living in a Vacuum

I don't know about you, but I love lukewarm weather. There is just something about a tepid New England afternoon that makes me want to sit outside on the portico in a short-sleeve shirt and shorts, smoking a clove and watching busy UMass students as they go about their day.

Everyone seems so blissfully complacent these days, scuttling about as if there was not a care in the world. How very ignorant we lemmings are. Those living at the University have been lulled into a narcoleptic sense of ignorance — victim to the opiate of apathy. Either that, or way, way too much ecstasy.

Now, I am not saying that our student body is uncultured; we here at the school know nothing but culture. Ask anyone on campus how to roll a joint and they will either point you in the direction of the nearest E-Z Wider representative or give you a live demonstration in the basement of the Campus Center. And therein lies the problem. We have become so enraptured in the malaise of own lives that only a select few care to equip themselves with the armament of knowledge. Everyone else is too busy listening to Redman and DMX. Unfortunately, these intellectual patricians are a faint minority.

Now, one can say that they are "informed", but a mere comprehension of world issues is unsatisfactory. We as college students are charged with the privilege of engendering opinions about such issues. That, and drinking malt liquor, are the tenets of our fine university. Indeed, it is these privileges that dignifies mankind and allows for the resolve of the conflicts that both incapacitate and threaten our very existence.

If Liquors 44 or Table & Vine were forced to close, alcoholics across campus would take to the streets in seething anger. But fortunately, such an extinction-level event has not taken place. However, as so few students and faculty seem to be aware, there is a large-scale conflict being waged in Yugoslavia.

Every day, NATO airplanes are dropping bombs over Serbian homes and villages. Refugees are being torn from their homes in a vile and contemptible manner. Weed is being wasted.

Can you imagine if the chaos that reigns over Europe as we speak were to invade Amherst? Granted, I wake up at about two o'clock every day, but what if my dilatory alarm clock were to be replaced by the shrill of a mortar blast? What if my bottle of Bailey's Irish Cream were to be impregnated by some stray bullet? What if that treasured clove were to remain unsmoked? What if I didn't contract lung cancer? Aaaah!

Kosovo is not the only threat to the good will of our nation and our earth as a whole. Recently, both the nations of Iraq and North Korea have been discovered to be stockpiling nuclear arsenals. Think about that phrase for a second; "nuclear arsenal". Did any of you ever read Nevil Shute's On The Beach? No? Allow me to summarize:

Nuclear powers across the world launch thousands of cobalt bombs, entering the world into a nuclear holocaust in which every last living thing, including my roommate (whoo-hoo!), dies.

Cobalt bombs, not cherry bombs. These are not the clean, tidy bombs that your mom used to make. They have a half-life of 96 years. They will get you higher than a gravity bong. Unfortunately, after hitting a cobalt bomb, the only sleep you will pass out into will be the cold slumber of death. And Satan doesn't smoke. He eats veggie burgers.

So kiss that new hibachi good bye, Amherst. Put down those crunchy M&M's. Go to the dining hall. Have promiscuous sex with many anonymous partners (except my roommate). There's nothing to worry about, really. Accept what fate has dealt you and never question anything. And I'll see you in hell, next to Chancellor Scott and that poor cow that was pushed off a tower in Southwest. I mean really, who pushes a cow off a building? What a waste of beef.

The game of life

Brian Lohnes

The worlds of medical and computer science have been growing and expanding at an extremely fast rate over the last decade. It seems to be only a matter of time before these two genres converge into what promises to be a very exciting and somewhat frightening time. The two superpowers of the scientific world have been making such great advances that they are making old sci-fi novels look like how–to books.

It strikes me as funny that Jules Verne's fantastic and "outlandish" stories from many decades ago are now coming true. There is only one thing that medical science cannot do... yet. We may be able to clone and grow body parts on rats, but we still cannot create life from scratch. Scientists cannot mix a whole bunch of elements and chemicals together and "create" life.

This statement leads to a very strange question: what is life? This question has raised quite a debate among me and my friends of late. Is life some magical and mystical thing created by some higher power? Or, Is life a very complex sequence of chemical reactions that causes us to do what we do? No one is able to answer this question with 100 percent confidence, but it is an interesting topic.

Unfortunately, I do believe that medical science will someday reach the point of being able to create life. I am dreading that day and I hope that I don't live to see it. When that day comes, babies won't be born, they will be created. Children will be made to have the "proper" characteristics such as high mental aptitude, physical appearance and other things, like athletic ability. Even today, some doctors claim to be able to alter some features on children.

To me this takes all the fun out of having kids. A young child is someone that parents have a huge part in molding into who he or she becomes. If this experience is taken away and having a baby is like ordering options on a new car, the world will be a boring place to live.

Once again I ask you, what is life? Even I, the usually smart–ass writer, have no idea where to even begin on this one. If you believe the theory of creation, some may label you as "religious" — then again if you think that it is all a sequence of chemical reactions, you may come off as insensitive. No matter what you believe in, life is a complex and confounding thing.

I have recently been relegated to thinking it is a chemical process because two Sundays ago, my grandfather had a stroke and upon further testing, terminal lung and brain cancer were discovered. When someone is telling you the lung capacity of your grandfather and how much it is decreasing, the mystical side of things fades pretty damn quick. Even cancer is a chemical thing: something that even medical science has no control over.

It's a very strange sensation when someone gives you the news that a close family member is very sick, or in my case, dying. It makes you question yourself a lot. The evidence that has been laid out before me has shown that life is a special and mystical thing, yet it is fickle and not to be toyed with. My grandfather is, in essence, running out of time. He is running out of time because of chemical factors, and the cancer won't stop until it has finished its horrible work. I have discovered that life is beautiful, no matter how long or short it may be. My grandfather is happy and he is going to fade out peacefully, like a huge friendly star that has burned the last of its hydrogen.

There is one more thing that medical science hasn't figured out yet and that thing is love. An unconquerable feeling that will be with him to the end and beyond... so maybe that creation thing isn't as crazy as I thought before.

Affirmative action is good — but hup know what would be really great, Chancellor? Free Nutty Buddies: anytime, all the time. To correct historical wrongdoings and currency, white heterosexual males don't get any Nutty Buddies. The shoe will be on the other foot then, oh yes.

Her smell of wet socks, her weird gurgling sounds, and the way she brought me my morning paper and slippers: it's a goddamned shame it had to end like this. She's in a better place now, a place where there's no such thing as cheap gasoline or bird poop.

If my car were a person, would it have gotten into UMass? It's white and old, but not Scottish. Two out of three ain't bad (plus, I'd bet it'd rip through the math section of the SATs).

I don't mean to get preachy or Women's Issues Editor–y here, but I have a real problem with the sexualization of young girls (e.g., Britney Spears). When you have a very provocative, sexy image of a young woman, and then have her playing with dolls in pig tails, I smell something foul — and it's not Baby Soft perfume. Rolling Stone is a thorn in my side. When was the last time you saw the Backstreet Boys on the cover, in their sheer boxers sucking their thumbs and playing with plastic fire trucks? No, I wouldn't particularly want to see that either, but I'm just saying...

said. "He's still thinking about it. We've discussed some things, but as of right now, he's OK."

• Murmurs of transferring have also spread to the UMass front court. Second–year freshman Ronnell Blizzard had entertained such thoughts at times during the regular season, but seemed to dispel them after an outstanding finale against Xavier in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

"I think, in terms of Blizz, (and not just in the Xavier game), once he started to figure out some things, he was a little better," Flint said. "He got an opportunity to play. What people don't realize is the [talent] of the two guys he played behind, Chris Kirkland and Kit Rhymer. They played pretty good for us, so that was one of the things we discussed."

• Soon–to–be graduate Lari Ketner will head to Phoenix next week to partake in the NBA pre–draft Desert Classic. Despite an extremely disappointing season, the 6–foot–10 center still clings to legitimate hopes of an NBA career. If Ketner can somehow reproduce the form he had during his sophomore and junior seasons, there may be a glimmer of light at the end of the proverbial tunnel for him.

"I know if he plays well out there, [NBA] will start to bring him in and working him out," Flint said of Ketner. "People keep telling me that they still think he's going to be a first–round pick. These post–season [workouts] sometimes are even more important than what you do during the season. If he does well, you never know."

But, as the case has always been with him, Lari Ketner's worst enemy is Lari Ketner. He better hope that the "happy" Lari appears in the desert. But even if it does, it may be nothing more than a mirage.

Women's track faces East Coast's top teams

On Saturday, the corner of Broadway and 116th St will be the women's track capital of the Northeast when Columbia University hosts the region's best at the annual Columbia Invitational on April 10.

The Minutewomen will travel to New York after coming off a disheartening loss last weekend to Dartmouth College in which they saw their hammer, discus and javelin throwers get shut out from crucial points.

"If we placed second or third in one of the throwing events we would have won the meet," UMass Coach Julie LaFreniere said. "We're looking for improvements over last week in the throws as well as the other events."

"Overall, we need a better performance from everyone."

UMass will face stiff competition in this 15–team meet. The competing teams are Boston College, Southern Connecticut State University, Cornell, Fordham, Harvard, Lehigh, Manhattan College, Long Island University, Marist College, Yale, St. John's, the University of New Haven, Rowan College, as well as host Columbia.

"We need to compete at a different level. All the athletes need to step up," LaFreniere said. "We'll be facing stiff competition across the board. We have athletes competing in every event."

LaFreniere is a strong advocate of putting athletes in every event. Some schools specialize in certain events, but the UMass program tries to be strong in all of them.

Cornell has a solid program across the board. Manhattan and St. John's feature outstanding sprinters and jumpers. BC and Yale are two of the premier distance programs in the region. LIU has outstanding sprinters, while host Columbia's squad looks to be much improved from years past.

"We hit 'em hard this week [talking about practice]," LaFreniere said. "Every week we get closer to our goals."

Last week, the Minutewomen were allowed to enter as many athletes in each event as possible. For this week's meet the list has been trimmed in hopes faring better.

"It's a non–scoring meet so we're going to take advantage of that and concentrate on improving in individual events," LaFreniere said. "We won the 4x100 relay last week, but our handoffs were ugly. The team is capable of a better time than they ran."

Alison Tostevin

At Dartmouth, senior Nicole Way ran in the 1500 meters, the 800 meters and the 4x400 relay. This week she is slated to compete in only the 1500 meters. Taking such measures will help the athletes be more concentrated and allow them to compete at the level that LaFreniere expects and knows that they are capable of.

another year. Last year, they were slapped a second place finish by an almost identical fraction of points.

Kuzara must find it hard to keep a straight face watching this team day in and day out. The UMass women's performances have been like that of fine wine, they just get better with time. The progression of the season has seen the Minutewomen out–do themselves over and over again. Road trips, nationally ranked teams, and injuries have been nothing more than a pest to their goal of reaching the NCAA's.

Now that they have accomplished their goal of getting there, winning doesn't seem like as much of an obstacle. Kuzara can look for good things from the tried and true Mosby in the all–around, as well as in a cast of others waiting to take center stage. Sanyal has seemed to be nothing short of perfect, Michelle LoPresti provides solid efforts on the vault, bars and beam. A combination of Tracy Chew and Jennifer Pokrana putting up their usual numbers could make Kuzara a proud papa when all is said and done on Saturday.

Minutemen make a racket at weekend Cornell Invitational

By James Piehl

Captain Kevin Curley

Over the weekend, the Massachusetts men's tennis team had a strong showing in the Cornell Invitational, with seven Minutemen advancing to third–round singles action, and two of four teams advancing in doubles to the finals.

UMass Coach Judy Dickson said, "Clearly this the best men's tennis team we've had since I've been coach."

Freshman transfer Steve Prisco lead the way for UMass, advancing to semifinals action of the Flight A singles bracket before falling to the top seed, Greg Artzi of Cornell 6–1, 6–2. Prisco then teamed with junior Rob Manchester to win the Flight A doubles title 8–6 over Tyler Hunsberger and Andrew Naylor of Bloomsburg. This is a feat that the UMass men's doubles team has never accomplished in its history.

Also putting in strong performances for the Minutemen were senior Todd Cheney, junior Parta Samii, and sophomore Fabian Rabanal. Cheney advanced to the semifinals of the Flight B singles bracket falling to Ranade of Dartmouth 6–4, 3–6, 7–5, while Samii and Rabanal teamed to advance to the finals of the Flight B doubles before going down to the third–seeded team of Josh Benjamin and Peter Stahl of Cornell, 8–5.

Assistant Coach Justin Lynn said, "For Samii and Rabanal to reach the finals this early in the season shows that we have a strong doubles B team also."

Coach Dickson was very pleased with the results of the tournament. "This definitely bodes well for the program this year. We performed well in all of the divisions."

According to Dickson, the duo of Prisco and Manchester is "the best doubles team." Although a freshman transfer, Prisco is already an integral part of the UMass men's tennis program. He has taken over the No. 1 position on the singles team, moving junior Rob Manchester to the No. 2 spot. This relieves some pressure from Manchester, who shouldered the load last semester.

"Steve Prisco will prove to be an invaluable enforcer," Dickson said. "He will certainly make things easier, especially for Robby."

Lynn also added, "Prisco proceeds to be an amazing competitor for a freshman. He has a real ability to feed off the pressure in big point situations."

The team is eagerly awaiting the Brown matchup on Friday. The Ivy League has a tradition of being extremely competitive in men's tennis. This will be a big step for UMass, who has never faced Brown.

According to coach Dickson, "This [the match] will be an indicative test of our abilities."

The team plays next in a dual match on Friday, February 12 at Brown at 4:00 p.m. in Providence, R. I.

Women's water polo surges toward East Championship

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Heading into the 1999 season, the No. 9 Massachusetts women's water polo team faced a veritable waterfall of lofty expectations. Having wrapped up 1998 with a 30–6 record and an Eastern Championship title, the Minutewomen knew that the top programs would all be gunning for them this year, hoping to topple the Maroon and White juggernaut.

Quite simply, the Minutewomen would not be denied their place in the sun. And heading into this weekend's Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championships with a perfect (17–0) record in the East, UMass will look to once again leave the rest of the collegiate field dead in the water.

The Minutewomen tote an Impressive 10–game winning streak and a 19–4 record into the tourney, which will be hosted by No. 13 Princeton. UMass will square off with the Tigers at 10 a.m. on Saturday, then gear up for a contest with the Rams of Bucknell at 7:30 p.m.

The semifinals and finals are on Sunday, with No. 16 Maryland and No. 20 Harvard being the top teams on the other side of the bracket.

Despite their gaudy record in the East, the Maroon and White can ill afford to take this weekend's competition lightly. Although both the Terrapins and Tigers are among the squads already bested by UMass in 1999, both teams gave the Minutewomen quite a fight before knuckling under.

Facing the Terps at the Princeton Invitational in March, UMass saw intense defensive pressure from a Maryland team intent on capsizing the defending champs. Juniors Katie Grogan and Marci Hupp drew an almost constant double–team on offense, forcing the Minutewomen to pass out of the post and rely on outside shooting to score.

Luckily, field players like co–captain Claudia Clement and fellow juniors Laurie Edwards and Lyndsay Crenshaw were able to crank up the Maroon and White attack with lethal outside shooting, and UMass prevailed in a 9–7 final.

"Maryland really pressured us in the set," said Hupp afterward. "It sort of caught us off guard, and forced us to adjust."

Later at the same tournament, host Princeton used a similar defensive strategy to befuddle the Minutewomen, sending multiple defenders at the UMass front in hopes of creating mismatches and turnovers. The Tiger defense proved to be a thorn in the Maroon and White's side, and UMass saw its lowest offensive output of the season in winning a 6–2 squeaker.

Despite that early–season scare, UMass improved to 7–0 all–time versus Princeton. The Minutewomen are 2–1 all–time against Bucknell, with this being their first meeting since a 15–6 UMass win at the 1997 Eastern Championships. UMass brings a 4–3 record against Maryland and a 7–3 mark versus Harvard into the tournament as well.

With a 16–4 thrashing of Brown on March 31, the Minutewomen concluded Collegiate Water Polo Association New England Division regular season play with a perfect 10–0 record. UMass has never lost in regular–season league play, going 26–0 in the first three seasons of the league and winning the CWPA New England Championship in 1997 and 1998.

"We know this team is capable of bringing home another Eastern title," said Coach Dan McOsker, who has guided UMass to a 49–10 (.831) overall mark in his first two seasons at the helm. "With our experience from last year and our depth, another championship is definitely our goal."

Ani DiFranco to play Mullins

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Have you ever seen that show "Fanatic" on MTV — where fans (or as the police call them, "stalkers", ahem) get to meet the celebrity they idolize? Well, after some thought, I decided if I was a little bit more brazen, and a little bit more pathetic, perhaps — I'd definitely send in my home video to meet Ani DiFranco.

The glitch is she would never appear on MTV's Fanatic because it's complete drek; and that is one of the many, many reasons I adore her.

There are few performers that put all of themselves into their songs. Most female artists' lyrics and musical content are merely secondary to their images. But Ani never belittles her listener. Whether her songs are about corporate America or wanting someone you can't have, she strikes a raw, unidentifiable feeling, and translates it into gorgeous words and metaphors.

DiFranco was even nominated for a Grammy for "Glass House" (off of Little Plastic Castles) in the category for Best Female Rock Performance. She lost out to Alanis Morrisette — a cheap, poor, tasteless imitation. Would you eat Spam and pretend it's steak?

Lyrics like "A door opens/ the room winces/ the housekeeper comes in without a warning/ I roll over and taste the pillow with my grin," kind of sum up her brilliance. Alanis: "Would she go down on you in a theater?" Not brilliant.

DiFranco's albums have grown with her through the years. On the label she created, Righteous Babe Records, she has created a collection of albums, including Puddle Dive, Not a Pretty Girl, Dilate, Little Plastic Castles and, most recently, Up, Up, Up, Up, Up, Up that reflect the changes in her personal life. Some longtime fans claim DiFranco has strayed from her political–power folk roots, leaning towards more relationship based songs. But as DiFranco says on her double–live album, Living in Clip, about her record company's reaction to her gravitation to love songs: "Well, I just got a little distracted…."

And who doesn't change their lifestyle and mantra as the years go by? It is a shame that someone's sexuality and personal life get more attention than the art they dedicate their life to.

DiFranco started Righteous Babe Records in 1990 in Buffalo when she was only 20 years old. She borrowed money from friends to cover costs of incorporation and studio time. In a 1995 Newsday article, DiFranco explains her desire to be on her own label.

"I don't think the music industry is conducive to artistic and social change and growth. It does a lot to exploit and homogenize art and artists. In order to challenge the corporate music industry, I feel it is necessary to remain outside it."

With all that said, DiFranco's music is best–suited for the stage. When performing this summer in Philadelphia, and last year at the William D. Mullins Center, DiFranco's energy and passion for music sent the audience into a frenzy. Her guitar playing is filled with delicious rage and her tiny 5–foot–2–inch presence seems gargantuan. Every song in her repertoire gains a new perspective and meaning when you hear it live.

Ani DiFranco will be performing tonight at the Mullins Center at 8 p.m. All tickets are $22 and can be purchased at the Mullins Center Box Office or by calling Ticketmaster at 733–2500.

New & wild music for Spring

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

Since the Middle Ages, the trombone and the saxophone have both been considered to possess qualities similar to that of the human voice. This voice–like quality was the inspiration for the concert that will be presented by the UMass Chamber Choir, Madrigal Singers, Trombone Choir and alto saxophonist Lynn Klock this Sunday, April 11, at Bowker Auditorium beginning at 8 p.m.

"One highlight of the evening will be the New England premiere of American Suite by Warren Martin," said Chamber Choir director E. Wayne Abercrombie. "Each movement of the piece is based on an American poem." Another New England premiere will include pieces by Catherine McMichael for chorus and alto saxophone, featuring UMass saxophone professor Lynn Klock. McMichael will be on to play the piano section.

The Chamber Choir will end their section of the concert with Alleluia by Randall Thompson. They will also play a rarely performed piece by Claudio Monteverdi entitled Domine ne in furor tuo, and a multi–choir piece by Giovanni Garbieli. These Italian pieces, combining trombone and voice, were initially performed in Venice in the 17th century. "They are sonic — surround–sound stuff," said Abercrombie. "Hopefully, these pieces will belay the belief that old music is dull." And they will perform an arrangement of an Alice Parker spiritual.

The Madrigal Singers, under the direction of Robert Eisenstein, will appropriately perform songs about Spring and love from different historical periods.

The program will also include the University Trombone Choir, directed by David Sporny. The ensemble will perform Sonata for Trombones by Bristol, Two Bagatelles by Reed, and the world premiere of Three Moods by Stephen Jean, who will graduate from UMass Department of Music & Dance this year.

Though a highly professional musical group, the Chamber Choir is not entirely composed of music majors. "There are computer science, psychology, history, and education majors," said Abercrombie. "It is made up of people who love to sing and that is the most important thing."

In addition to this Spring concert, the Chamber Choir is planning a trip to Italy, where they will perform. The Chamber Choir has also been featured at various ceremonies across the state. This past Tuesday they had the opportunity to travel to Boston for the day to perform at the State House for the Distinguished Alumni Awards. Last year, they had the honor of performing at the inauguration of University of Massachusetts President William Bulger. Also annually, the Chamber Choir has been utilized for various honors ceremonies at the Mullins Center.

Tickets for the 8 p.m. concert are available at the Bowker Box Office (413) 545–2511 or at the door of Bowker. Admission is $4 for students, seniors and children, and $8 for all others.

Skirkanich was the tough–luck pitcher as his team struggled offensively and defensively behind him.

"This was the worst exhibition of UMass baseball in 12 seasons," Stone said. "There are no answers. We just have to make the plays."

The Minutemen hope to get on the right track when they begin a three–game series tomorrow against Xavier. On Saturday, senior Bill Cooke (2–2), who has struck out 15 batters in 23.1 innings of work, will serve it up against the Musketeers in the first half of the double–dipper starting at 12 p.m. Travis Veracka (1–2) will take over the pitching duties in the second half.

On Sunday, David Loonie (2–1) will take to the mound. Loonie's batters are hitting .275 against him as the right– hander averages almost one strikeout per inning.

The senior second baseman is batting a boiling .389 in her past six games, and has collected six RBI, including a home run at St. Joseph's last Sunday.

The Explorers enter tomorrow's contest on what they may consider a hot streak of sorts. They have won two of their last four games. A win on Saturday would take them where no 1999 UMass visitor has gone before — to the winner's circle.

Despite the presence of two hitters with a batting average over .300 (K.C. Crowder .407, Megan Georgvich .307), the Rams have dropped a multitude of close games in 1999, making their poor record rather deceiving.

Hoping to avoid any type of letdown this weekend, Minutewoman coach Elaine Sortino is urging her team toward improvement, no matter who the opponent may be.

"We've got to do a little bit better of a job," Sortino said after her team whipped Central Connecticut on Tuesday. "Our pitchers need to hit the outside corner better. I think we need to work on going with the outside pitch a little more."

In its two previous contests, the UMass opponents collected only one hit, and seldom made any contact at the plate to put the ball in play. Sortino hopes that her squad's fielding won't be too rusty.

"Defensively we didn't have to do too much [against Central Connecticut]. We just have to keep our defense in tune."

women's lacrosse

LaSalle, but it's always nice being home"

Working against UMass will be the increasing number of injuries the team is enduring.

Defenders Shalee Merkle and Colleen Wales will miss the game with ACL tears, while midfielders Sara MacNabb, Eileen Currier and Stephanie Pavlick are all slowed by various ailments. Goalie Tara Durkin, who was the starter in the net when the season began, has recently suffered a mild concussion as well. Attack Fay Naber might also miss the games due to a personal conflict.

Picking up the scoring slack have been MacNabb and midfielders Rebecca Minuker and Melissa Anderson.

MacNabb scored two goals on Wednesday in a 13–6 loss at Dartmouth, and notched a goal and two assists at home against Hofstra the Friday before.

Sophomore Kara DePaula also played well against the Big Green as well, and will be likely be relied on again this weekend. Senior co–captain Laura Kortz has shown that she can dominate games, but the three–time team leader in scoring has only recorded two multi–goal games this season.

The goaltending tandem of Durkin and Jen Nardi will also need to be productive to bolster the weakened defense. Nardi made a career–high 20 saves against Dartmouth while facing 37 shots.

UMass crew rests up after a strong victory

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

It has been too long. Two weeks ago, the Massachusetts women's crew (currently 6th in the nation; 4th overall in 1998) pulled a decisive victory in the varsity event against state rival Boston University in front of UMass home crowd. Since then, there has been no news about the women's crew. They have been resting. They have been going back to the basics, but they are far from over.

"This [break] has been great," assistant coach Kate Hubbard said. "We have been rowing a lot of miles. It was nice for us to get one race under our belt and to have two full weeks to take a step back [and] have the time to work on what we need to work on rather than just race preparation."

Hubbard continued, "[Basically, coach Jim Dietz] goes back to the basics a little bit, reminding [the team] the fundamentals rather than just going crazy all–out fast–as–they can go all the time."

And better yet, to break loose of this long and anticipated break, they have Villanova at bat in New Jersey at Camden this Saturday. And then, awaiting them on Sunday, is the team that was ranked third in the nation last year, Virginia.

Last year, Virginia's varsity eight were tied with the Minutewomen's NCAA silver medal varsity squad, but their JV boat beat UM's JV.

This year, Virginia looks even better. They just came out from a big victory over Michigan, Ohio, and North Carolina, and then on crew classic in Santiago, held earlier this year, Virginia came in second only to Washington, three–time defending national champion by a small margin.

It couldn't get bigger than this in college crew events, and the Minutewomen's own varsity eight will use this weekend as a "benchmark" to see how good they really are. Led by senior captain Neyla Leslie and junior standout Verena Loch, UMass has one of its strongest heavyweight eight lineup in the school history. Physically, they will match Virginia's squad. If not row stronger and better. It's the question of mental, but the Minutewomen have been very consistent this season, and the team works extremely well together.

"We are going to get a lot of racing on flat water," Hubbard said. "[And plus] we are going against the best of the best. We are excited."

Minutewoman notes: The lightweight is getting its first action of the season. Led by captain Renee Domina, senior Melissa Allen, and junior Stephanie Kren, UMass lightweight will have the weekend of their own against Princeton, Villanova, Radcliff, and Virginia.

experience," Cannella said. "We'll shoot for his weak areas, although he is certainly not a weak goalie. But everybody has a weak area, and we'll try to attack his."

If there is a weak area for the Minutemen it could be confidence, after last Saturday's 8–7 loss at the hands of visiting Butler. But a refocused effort, combined with a nothing–to–lose attitude, could play in UMass' favor.

"We're trying to refocus and recommit, but the loss is certainly still with us and probably will be until we get out on the field at Duke," Cannella said. "The guys have a good attitude though. They know there is no pressure on us. The pressure is all on Duke."

men's gym

Lieberman. Young or sophomore Mike Alexander could each catapult his way to an impressive high score.

Although UMass has a chance to score well on parallel bars, is has characteristically been one of the team's lowest scoring events.

"We've been working on our consistency on each of the events," said Johnson "and I think the most improved event is the parallel bars."

Either great parallel bar worker Pryor or LaVallee could destroy the other competitors with outstanding performances. And both Plumber and freshman John Szymczyk could bring in great scores as well.

On horizontal bar, potentially the most dangerous of the six events, UMass' depth is truly illustrated. Both ECAC Champion Lieberman and all–time UMass record holder LaVallee have great chances of advancing to NCAA Nationals on the event, and with an impressive double– twisting–double–layout dismount, Leis could bring in an awesome score as well. Also, Alexander and Hershey could place among the top finishers with their great form and solid routines.

Each of the Minutemen are capable of top–notch performances, and when combined, the possibilities for this team are endless. They are more than capable of placing among the top three teams, and if they score as well as they did at ECACs, they will mark yet another milestone in UMass history as they advance to NCAA Nationals in two weeks.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You're going to have to use time with tremendous efficiency today. Economy is the name of the game as you go about doing things that must be done.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Others are likely to respond to your own actions today the way that you had anticipated, but by day's end, everyone can meet somewhere in the middle.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may think that you're "calling the shots" today, but in fact, you're really servicing those who are in the positions of authority.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Someone is going to want you to do something very special and unusual before the day is out. Are you ready and willing to take the risk?

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Pay attention to things as you pass them by today, and you'll realize that everything around you is an essential part of one glorious collage.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Thanks to your own unique way of seeing to the heart of the matter, a mystery early on is likely to become a comfort to you by day's end.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You're going to be just a little more moody than usual today, and you better warn a friend or co–worker that you're likely to be unpredictable.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Are you ready for something big that's just around the corner? You may have asked yourself this question before, but this time may be a little different.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Trust your instincts today. You'll be able to produce something remarkably original and worth the attention of those around you.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You must be willing to give way a little today in order to keep from offending someone who's involvement is pivotal to your success.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Take care that you're not seeing things through a shroud of misconceptions. Someone close to you knows how to make things clear to you.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — This is a good day for you to put things together in a manner that provides a great many answers, as well as raises a few important questions.

UMass to face Musketeers after loss

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

The errors continued to mount for the Massachusetts baseball team (11-11, 1-2 Atlantic 10) yesterday, despite a hopeful uniform switch, as it was shut out by Connecticut (16-13, 2-7 Big East), 8-0 at Earl Lorden Field.

Nick Skirkanich accepted the loss for UMass as the right- hander drops to 1-2 on the season. Skirkanich pitched six solid innings, allowing 10 hits and two walks while striking out four. Though the Huskies manufactured all of their runs in the first six frames, the sophomore was credited with just four of them. The Minutemen had four unearned runs scored off of four errors.

"We just didn't execute," UMass Coach Mike Stone said. "We looked as sloppy as I have ever seen."

The Huskies produced one run in the first when Clarke Caudill, who was batting a gaudy .390 with 30 RBI prior to yesterday's matchup, belted a home run over the right field fence. In the second inning, Jon Robinson reached first on a walk and Glenn Katz hit a single to right field. Brian Tisbert sacrificed to move the runners over. UMass senior Brian Mazzaferro then committed two clutch errors which UConn took advantage of for two more runs, making it 3-0.

The Huskies would tack on two more runs off three hits in the third as UMass remained scoreless. UConn would add another run in the fourth before Massachusetts finally got a hit.

UMass went down in order for the first five innings until shortstop Seth Kaplan broke Husky pitcher Jeff Fulchino's no-hitter with a double. However, the senior would be left stranded following a strikeout and Shaun Skeffington's fly out to center field. Gavin Clark tallied the other UMass hit with a single into center field in the bottom of the seventh but was left to dangle as the Minutemen couldn't convert a run.

The top of the sixth saw a Joe Kagerer two-run round tripper as Tisbert, who reached on a double, also crossed home on courtesy of Kagerer.

Craig Szado relieved Skirkanich and tossed two innings of scoreless ball while giving up one hit in 11 batters and sitting down one Husky.

UMass' freshman Brian Hourigan stepped it up in the top of the ninth. The Beacon Falls, Conn. native struck out two although Brian Esposito reached first anyway on a drop- three strike.

Connecticut's Fulchino was the winner of the day, going the distance while striking out seven Minutemen and allowing just a pair of hits and two walks. The freshman improves to Nick Skirkanich let up four earned runs as the baseball team dropped to UConn yesterday, 8–0.

Cruz's plans may backfire; Ketner set for workouts

The carnival is over for Rafael Cruz, and if he doesn't act fast, his ship may be headed for a sea of trouble.

The sophomore guard had planned on transferring to Marshall. In fact, that was the only place he had in mind. UMass coach Bruiser Flint cleared him to play for the Thundering Herd, but it seems as though they don't want him now. With a roster full of guards, Marshall coach Greg White was looking for a post player. And now Cruz has no place to call home.

"I've called some [other] schools for him myself, but I think he has his heart set on Marshall," Flint said. "If the Marahall thing doesn't work out, I don't know if he has a plan B."

One particular option Cruz will not have is a return to the Minutemen. Given the nature of the departure, Flint has no plans on allowing him to stay in Amherst, but he will ensure that Cruz finds another Division I program.

"He's not coming back. I just want to make sure he gets into school somewhere," Flint said. "I just wish he had an idea, other than Marshall, where he wants to go. I thought the Marshall thing was all set. Come to find out, a couple of people have come to me and said they've been saying [something else] in their newspapers. But we'll find something for him."

Although occasionally known for his scoring and passing ability, Cruz will not be missed by Flint, who was aggressively recruiting other guards long before Cruz considered transferring.

His 1998-99 season was highlighted by two breakthrough performances, the first of which was a 16-point showing against Duquesne on January 13, and a five-assist turnout on February 17 at George Washington. Despite his ability to contribute offensively, Cruz's playing time was significantly decreased because of his struggles on the defensive end.

Anu with St. John's transfer Shannon Crooks likely assuming the starting point guard duties next season, Cruz would have faced a return to the bench, where he was already competing for playing time with sophomore guard Jonathan DePina. The prospect of also battling new recruits may have made Cruz's decision a bit easier.

"I was going to recruit a guard anyway. In that respect it doesn't change things," Flint said. "I'm in the current back court situation. "I told [Rafael] I was recruiting another guard, and we have Shannon coming in, so he thought his prospects of playing somewhere else were better."

• In addition to Cruz, rumors of a possible DePina transfer had surfaced numerous times during the season. The South Boston native had, at best, an up-and-down 1998-99 campaign and was also considering a move, perhaps one nearer to home at Boston College or Boston University.

After starting for an injured Charlton Clarke in the final UMass game of the season, DePina seemed optimistic about his future with the Minutemen. But Flint's recent pursuit of backcourt recruits leaves DePina in a bit of a fix.

"I told Jonathan the same thing I told Rafli, that I'm going to recruit another guard, and he said OK," Flint

UM gymnasts make history with a trip to the NCAA East Regionals

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow, history will be made in Champagne, Illinois as the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team makes its first- ever appearance at the NCAA East Regional. Two weeks ago, the Minutemen earned a crushing victory over ten other schools at the ECAC Championship and will now join the other top teams of the region in the fight for a spot at NCAA Nationals, which are to be held on April 22-24.

UMass, led by top all-around gymnasts junior Jeff LaVallee and senior Stephen Pryor, needs to place among the top three tomorrow in order to advance to the national competition in two weeks: a challenge for any team, but certainly within the grasp of the Minutemen.

"I'm really looking forward to this weekend," said coach Roy Johnson. "I think we've really improved since ECACs: the guys are looking really good in practice. [Freshman] Matt Plumber is doing really well on parallel bars and both Steve and Jeff are looking great as usual."

Both LaVallee and Pryor earned GTE/CoSida Academic All-District 1 team honors last week for outstanding performances both academically and at the ECAC Championship.

The depth of the gym team is far greater than ever before, and it certainly has the potential to place among the top finishers this weekend. Olympic hopeful LaVallee and two- time captain Pryor are ranked No. 1 (58.250) and No. 2 (56.675) respectively in the FCAC all-around standings, and the talent doesn't stop there.

Senior Phil Liebermann, who holds the school record on the floor exercise (9.875) was crowned ECAC high bar champion and sophomore Bryan McNulty, who advanced to the NCAA Nationals on floor last year, could push UMass' overall score over the top. On the pommel horse, former NCAA National competitor sophomore Andrew Leis is one of the nation's best, as he holds the UMass all-time high of 9.85. On the rings, sophomore J.J. Hershey, with swift swing moves and brutal strength elements, could give the competition a run for the money. And the outspoken senior Dan Young could make an impression on the event with his consistent scores and strong routines.

On the vault, many of the Minutemen have the potential to take the gold medal as LaVallee, Pryor, McNulty, performance did not go with out a pat on the back in the form of the Most Outstanding Performer belt, her second in a row.

"I thought we performed to the best of our ability today (A-10's), and I am happy that we recorded our highest score of the year. We came through with a number of outstanding performances, especially on the balance beam." Coach Dave Kuzara said. "Mandy Mosby did an excellent job for us in the all-around, and Tracy Chew also had a great all-around performance.

I was also very happy with Anita Sanyal, who did an outstanding job in each of her three events."

Senior Anita Sanyal continues to do her best impressions of Wonder Women, cruising to two individual titles on the balance beam and the bars, sharing the latter with teammate Jennifer Pokrana. Sanyal's numbers on the balance beam, 9.925, gave her top honors on the team for the year and pushed the team to set a new team total high of 49.300.

The narrow margin of defeat dealt to the Minutewomen by the Colonials, that of .125 points, caused the A-10 Championship title to elude them

Women's lax to open A–10 conference play

For the first time in history, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will take part in Atlantic 10 conference play, hosting LaSalle this afternoon at 3:30 p.m. at Ruth J. Totman Field.

The Minutewomen are undefeated over the course of four home games, but have yet to win on the road, evening their record out to 4-4 to start the conference schedule.

This is the first year that the A-10 exists, and it includes UMass, LaSalle, Temple, St. Joseph's, Virginia Tech and Duquesne.

"We finally open up our A-10 schedule, and that's exciting," Massachusetts Coach Francesca McClellan said. "We have Friday and Sunday [games]."

On Sunday, the Minutewomen will stray from their conference for a game, playing Connecticut at Totman Field at 1:00 p.m.

UMass has struggled as of late, losing three of its last four matchups after exploding out of the blocks at 3–1. Last year, the Minutewomen snuck into the ECAC tournament with a 9–5 record. If that is to be the mark by which the team judges this season, they can afford to lose only one more regular season game out of the six remaining.

Although Massachusetts has never played LaSalle, it has had success in its limited exposure to UConn. Last season, UMass traveled to Storrs, Conn., and pummelled the Huskies, 15–4. Between the weekend's two opponents, the Minutewomen might just get back on the winning track.

"It should be a good weekend for us," McClellan said. "I think UConn will be slightly more competitive than

Softball set to host La Salle, Fordham for doubleheaders

By Aaron Soykin
Collegian Staff

It wouldn't be such a bad idea for the Explorers to get lost on their way to Amherst tomorrow. By the same token, the Rams may want to sharpen their horns a bit before coming on Sunday.

At any rate, all incoming opponents should brace themselves. The Massachusetts softball team has won seven of its last eight contests, and doesn't plan on losing another conference game... at least not without one helluva fight.

Thus far, the 1999 Minutewomen have resembled a rather tough team — one tough enough to suffer a large setback last weekend at Temple, but then respond with two overwhelming victories over Central Connecticut State on Tuesday. When UMass plays host to La Salle (10-16) and Fordham (3–26) for two days of double headers at Ruth J. Totman Field, things could get a bit ugly quickly, to say the least.

Senior pitcher Danielle Henderson has emerged from her own shadow of greatness, and has thrown three no-hitters in her last four appearances. She's given up two hits and no runs in her five most recent outings. She's also the reigning Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week, not to mention the 50 strikeouts she's collecticd in her last three starts.

In simple terms, one run of support for Henderson usually ensures a win for the Minutewomen. And that single run will not be terribly difficult to score. Mandy Galas, the A–10 Player of the Week, has been the recent victim of a bat explosion.

Men's lacrosse face No. 2 Duke

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

To those fans looking for an indication what this weekend's men's lacrosse game between Massachusetts (3–4) and No. 2 Duke may bring, a piece of advice: Don't try comparing the last two contests of the series.

With a 8–7 double–overtime loss in Durham two years ago and a 15–4 defeat in Amherst last season behind him, the only constant UMass coach Greg Cannella expects from Saturday's game at Duke Lacrosse Stadium is competition.

"Duke is an excellent team," Cannella said. "They are probably the best team in the country, regardless of rank."

The Blue Devils certainly have the wins to back up that statement. Undefeated at 8–0, Duke features a multi-talented offensive unit; one that boasts no overwhelming superstar but has quality players at each position.

"I think they feel that each of their guys is better than each one of your guys. I think they feel their six defenders can hold down your six guys," Cannella said. "They play a smash–mouth style and they'll probably try to go 1–on–1 with us."

Cannella also expects Duke to mirror the early–game attack of UMass' last Atlantic Coast Conference rival, Virginia. In that game, the Cavaliers bombed the Minutemen with five first–quarter scores while holding them to just one.

"I expect them to come out in a similar style to Virginia," Cannella said. "We're going to have to be ready right from the start. We will have to be mentally and physically ready. Those first five–10 minutes will be crucial."

The key to those game–opening moments is the game's first faceoff. While UMass has had a faceoff–by–committee campaign, it has been freshman midfielder Marc Morley who has handled the majority of the duties recently.

"Marc is good in that spot because he can pick up the groundballs at his feet and he can play on the offensive end," Cannella said.

But the Minutemen will have to contend with a strong face–off unit from the Blue Devils. Freshman Scott Bross has won 69 of the 102 faceoffs he has taken this year, a .676 percentage. When he's not at the line, senior Scott Diggs fills in. Diggs is no slouch either, having taken many faceoffs for the Devils of the past two years.

Continuing Cannella's theme of competition, UMass will not have an easy time when it does get the ball into Blue Devil territory. And if the Minutemen get by their defenders, they will face a young, but tested, goalie in sophomore Matt Breslin.

"Breslin played a bit last year, including in the tournament, so he has

Police work on pedestrian safety; drivers' speed to be displayed on sign

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police last week kicked off a month–long campaign to heighten awareness about pedestrian safety and enforce on–campus speed limits.

Throughout April, police officers will distribute "Walk Alert" flyers containing pedestrian safety tips. The officers will also issue citations to drivers who fail to yield to pedestrians, Deputy Police Chief Barbara O'Conner said. The citations carry a $100 fine.

In addition, an electronic roadside speed board borrowed from the Hampshire County Safe Roads Program will be used at various locations around campus. The board is calibrated to a radar and shows drivers how fast they are traveling. In the past, the board has been used as a tool to heighten driver awareness about speed.

"[But] this year, we'll not only catch your attention, we'll catch you," UMass police Chief John Luippold said.

A similar campaign last year yielded more than 100 violations. On average, the police stop more than 3,000 cars a year for exceeding the 10–20 mile per hour on–campus speed limits, Luippold said. As a result, many students feel University speed enforcement is too aggressive, he added.

But some students, like graduate teaching assistant Rebecca Ryan, feel the police do not do enough to enforce on–campus speed limits and ensure pedestrian safety. Ryan said she felt compelled by the recent pedestrian deaths of UMass students Kerry Hines and Allison Lustig to write a letter to Chancellor David K. Scott on behalf of graduate and undergraduate students in Community Health 160.

"It's a hard issue," Ryan said. "I don't know exactly what the solution is for this campus." But Ryan made several suggestions. Repainting all crosswalks with safety color, placing pedestrian crossing lights and caution signs at all major crosswalks and adding speed bumps on high–traffic roads, such as Commonwealth Avenue, were a few of them.

Student, faculty and staff members of the vice chancellor's Summit on Safety took these suggestions to heart as they met for a campus safety meeting and brainstorming session at the UMass police station Friday afternoon.

"Pedestrian safety has been a real concern for many years," said Ed Mienka, a representative from Environmental Health and Safety. "Some [of the discussion] has resulted in physical changes. Unfortunately, it has not been a [sustained] year–long in–and–out effort... maybe we need to think of some radical changes."

Ideas ranged from installing brightly–colored flexible plastic poles near crosswalks, to closing entire roads. Committee members also suggested striping roads and adding rumble strips to warn drivers they are approaching a crosswalk.

Roberta Potter, from Campus Center Food Services, agreed with Ryan's suggestion to repaint all crosswalks with safety colors, and said the colors should be "really ugly."

"It's hideous," she said, "but florescent red is not out of the question if it helps [save lives]."

Bruce Thomas, from the Physical Plant Facilities Planning Department, said the University is seeking a construction contract to replace the flashing light at the Commonwealth Avenue/Governors Drive intersection — where the March 11 death of Allison Lustig occurred — with a fully operational stop light. He estimated that the project would be completed by the end of November or December.

Ryan's speed bump suggestion was not feasible, however. It is illegal to place speed bumps on public ways because they would inhibit the passage of emergency vehicles. But speed bumps will be added on the access road from Lot 71 to Curry Hicks Cage, Luippold said.

Although the issue was not resolved within the two–hour meeting, committee members left with follow–up research assignments, and undergraduate student Gregory Ng said he left the meeting "with a sense of accomplishment."

"I'm proud [the committee] is taking a proactive role as opposed to a reactive role," he said. "It shows me the University is really focused on pedestrian safety and that makes me feel good."

Yuri honored over weekend

By Veronica MacDonald

[Editor's Note: This article was meant for the April 9 edition of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian.]

Yuri Kochiyama, a veteran of minority activism, was an honorary guest of several events last week including the opening of the Yuri Kochiyama Cultural Center, an Asian, Latino, African, Native American (ALANA) guest lecture last Thursday, and Asian Night last Friday.

Kochiyama, 78–years–old, has been a life–long civil rights activist fighting for issues ranging from the defense of Mumia Abu–Jamal to the preservation of affirmative action.

At Asian Night, Then Minh Ly, who introduced Kochiyama, and is a graduate student and former chair of the Asian American Students Association, shared his experiences of racism during his youth which caused his grades to suffer.

In reference to affirmative action, Ly claimed that the "Chancellor [David K. Scott] never got into a fight for being called a Chink" and said "there is a wave coming in from the right wing and hopefully it won't pull you down."

When introducing Kochiyama, Ly said that the audience was in the "presence of a great humanitarian." He felt that Kochiyama "embodies coalition building" and said "she's my vision... I have always loved her."

Speaking her own mind, Kochiyama said that if affirmative action was ever taken away from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst — "Asian Night would be no more." She further recommended to the audience they get to know their adversaries and allies so they can work in solidarity because they are not only people of color, but friends and professors too.

Asian Night was organized by the Asian American Students Association (AASA).

The cultural center opening was presented by AASA and funds from Ricardo Townes, assistant vice–chancellor of Campus Activities.

With Asian flags adorning the room and the honoree herself present, the Yuri Kochiyama Cultural Center, located under Worcester Dining Hall, was officially christened Thursday afternoon. The opening of the cultural center, included honorary comments and awards for Kochiyama.

During the gathering with invited guests, a series of brief honorary speeches were made for Kochiyama. Among them, Jaime Flores of Gamma Phi Sigma Hermanos Unidos, attributed a lot of what Latinos have now as due to Kochiyama's efforts and he urged everyone to look back on history and pass along the information. Nelson Acosta, director of ALANA affairs, hailed Kochiyama's presence saying — "we have a legend among us."

Kochiyama received an honorary plaque as well as art by a UMass student, Shamek Weddle. Weddle's mural depicts Lady Liberty, with a symbol of praising God in the foreground, while Kochiyama stands as a symbol of

Albright calls for cut in Serb army

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — Arriving for NATO talks intended to bolster allied unity, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said yesterday the number of Serb troops permitted to remain in Kosovo would have to be reduced in light of the onslaught against ethnic Albanians in the province.

In another potential policy shift bound to anger Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, Albright did not rule out partitioning Kosovo as part of a settlement, provided there are ways to protect Orthodox holy sites.

"Lots of parts of Rambouillet have been overtaken by events," Albright said of the accord, negotiated outside Paris, that was rejected by the Serbs and accepted by the Kosovar Albanians last month.

Albright said "there has to be recognition" of the Serb offensive that has forced the expulsion of more than one–third of the ethnic Albanians in what the Clinton administration has denounced as a "scorched–earth" campaign. But earlier yesterday, John Podesta, the White House chief of staff, said in Washington on NBC's "Meet The Press" that "the partition of Kosovo is not on the table." And Defense Secretary William Cohen, on ABC's "This Week," said: "Partition is out the question. Partition would simply be a reward to Milosevic and what he has set out to do.

Albright planned to meet today with the 18 foreign ministers of the allied governments. Before leaving Washington yesterday morning, she spoke with each by telephone.

"The alliance is wedge–proof" she told reporters on the trans–Atlantic flight.

Besides strategy for Kosovo, they will discuss the NATO summit meeting set for next week in Washington. Albright said among the new tasks the alliance will con–

Niger's new leader named amid doubts

By Tim Sullivan

NIAMEY, Niger — The head of the presidential guard unit that diplomats and witnesses say assassinated Niger's president has been named the new leader of this West African nation, the government announced yesterday.

Daouda Malam Wanke was named president and head of the National Council for Reconciliation, which will rule Niger for a nine–month transition period, state–run radio reported.

Wanke succeeds Ibrahim Bare Mainassara, who was killed Friday in a hail of gunfire by members of the security guard. Bare was buried yesterday in his home village, 185 miles east of the capital, Niamey. Military spokesman Hamidou Djibrila said the military had ordered the suspension of the constitution and the dissolution of the Supreme Court and National Assembly, in what amounted to a complete ouster of the former regime.

"The armed forces of Niger understand the gravity of the situation and decided to put to rest the institutional void created by the sudden death of Gen. Bare," Djibrila told journalists in Niamey.

India tests nuclear weapons; Officials say Agni II missile is a sign of country's will

By Arthur Max
Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — A new missile capable of carrying a nuclear warhead soared into the skies over India yesterday, defying U.S. appeals for restraint in weapons testing and raising fears of a new arms race with neighboring Pakistan.

India's Defense Minister George Fernandes said the successful 11–minute test flight of the Agni II missile marked a "great day for India," while Pakistan said it would decide in the next two or three days how to respond.

Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee said later in a nationally televised address that the Agni proved India's determination to strengthen its national security.

"In a rapidly changing security environment, India cannot depend on others to defend her. We have to develop our own indigenous capabilities. Agni is a symbol of that resurgent India," he said.

"India is on the move. And no one can hinder our progress if we remain unwavering and determined," he added.

The launch came nearly a year after India conducted a series of underground nuclear tests, prompting its rival, Pakistan, to respond with tests of its own. The two countries have fought three wars since they were carved from a British colony in 1947. The white, two–stage missile lifted off yesterday "without a hitch" from a new test site on India's eastern coast, carrying "a substantial payload," Fernandes said.

Indian naval ships and ground stations tracked the rocket as it soared from its rail–mounted launch pad into the sky, leaving a trail of thick white smoke. International shipping and airlines had been warned away from the test zone.

Fernandes said the range of the Agni was "in excess of 1,240 miles" — an increase of 310 miles over an earlier version of the rocket. Both models are capable of striking targets deep inside Pakistan and nearby China.

The Agni — which means "fire" in Sanskrit — was last test–fired in February 1994. With the Prithvi ("Earth") missile, it is expected to form the mainstay of India's nuclear delivery system. Both rockets can carry conventional and nuclear payloads. Speaking to reporters, Fernandes brushed aside questions about the political fallout of the test.

India will not compromise its national security with anyone, he said, adding: "We don't need to be told by anybody about restraint."

Pakistan was given advance warning of the launch, under an agreement signed in February when the Indian prime minister traveled overland to the Pakistani city of Lahore to meet his counterpart, Nawaz Sharif.

In the Pakistani capital of Islamabad, Foreign Minister Sartaj Aziz confirmed his government had received the warning Saturday. "We are disappointed and concerned," he told The Associated Press after the test. "We had decided on restraint."

Pakistan will have to decide in the next two or three days "how to respond to the Indian tests," Aziz said.

White House spokesman Mike Hammer said the missile test "appears to be out of step with positive developments in the political sphere." He said India's government informed the United States on Friday of its decision to test the missile.

"While we appreciate India's effort at transparency in its dialogue with us and with Pakistan, we regret the decision to test," Hammer said.

The United States has led international efforts to defuse tensions in the subcontinent, imposing economic sanctions after last year's nuclear tests, then easing them late last year amid signs of progress in arms control talks. Washington had also urged the two nations to resolve their dispute over the divided Himalayan territory of Kashmir, which both

NATO bombing as mass graves may exist

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Saying it showed restraint in deference to the Orthodox Easter holiday, NATO nonetheless hammered Serb targets in Kosovo yesterday. Western officials, meanwhile, expressed growing alarm over reports of atrocities in the province and said a possible mass grave site had been spotted.

Serb forces, British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook said Sunday after talking to an ethnic Albanian political leader in Kosovo. Cook said NATO holds Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic responsible for these "victims of his ethnic cleansing."

British officials also said about 100,000 ethnic Albanian men are apparently missing. The estimate, based on fewer than expected men turning up among refugees crossing into Macedonia and Albania, revived speculation that the men had either been massacred by Serbs, joined the rebel Kosovo Liberation Army or were being held hostage.

Many of the refugees managing to get across intermittently open borders — more than half a million, all told — tell of their villages being burned and emptied.

~News Brief~

The Amherst Fire Department responded to three small fires on the University of Massachusetts campus last Thursday and Friday — two are being considered "malicious arson."

Fire Captain Timothy Atteridge responded to a fire in a sixth-floor suite lounge in Brown Residence Hall on Thursday at 5:52 a.m. The fire was started in a recycling bin, Atteridge said, and damage was confined to the area. However, the fire was large enough to set off the sprinkler system and caused flooding throughout the suite.

The fire is under investigation because of its "suspicious origin," Atteridge said. Because a resident assistant lives in the suite, the main door is left open at all times, he explained. "Anyone could have come in and started the fire." There have also been similar fires in the past, he added.

A similar incident occurred at Kennedy Residence Hall the following day at 3:44 a.m. According to fire department reports, firemen responded to a recycling bin fire in the first-floor lobby that had been put out by two students using a portable fire extinguisher. The firemen also found a melted 10-gallon wastebasket in the 15th floor men's bathroom.

Amherst firemen also responded to a small grassfire near the Observatory on Thursday night. That incident, however, is not being considered arson. Rather, it was an illegal campfire started by students "having liquid beverages," Atteridge said. A driver spotted the fire and reported it to the fire department at 11:30 p.m. The students were gone upon arrival, but the fire was still burning. It was extinguished with approximately 30 gallons of water.

aftermath of a frenzy of violence, tape obtained but not filmed by Associated Press Television News showed a burned, deserted village just over the Macedonian border. Ethnic Albanians said it had been emptied in a recent assault. What looked to be a bloodied T-shirt lay among clothing scattered on the ground and dangling off fences. Two sheep had been shot in the head and thrown in a stream, apparently to contaminate the water.

NATO says the bombing campaign that began March 24 will go on until Milosevic withdraws Yugoslav and Serb units sent to Kosovo as part of his crackdown on the separatist KLA.

Shea, the alliance spokesman, said it was "a night of relative restraint" on the airstrikes. "We were mindful of the Orthodox Easter celebrations," he said.

In Belgrade, skies were gloomy and streets and squares nearly empty yesterday. Most people stayed home for the traditional Easter meal of roast lamb and a salad of new onions and radishes. Belgrade was unscathed in overnight air attacks, but 50 bombs hit in and around Pristina. The city's Slatina airport was hit more than two dozen times, the Serb-run Media Center said.

Shea said targets that were hit by NATO bombs and missiles included a fuel depot in Pristina, ammunition depots, bridges, communications facilities and air defense installations.

Yugoslavia's telecommunications system was beginning to collapse "because of the extensive damage inflicted on it" by the airstrikes, Tanjug quoted Dojcilo Radojevic, the telecommunications minister, as saying yesterday.

Yugoslavia reported six civilian deaths and 23 injuries in Sunday morning's strikes. Tanjug said civilian areas were hit in northern Kosovo and in the Serbian town of Kursumlija, 125 miles south of Belgrade. It said the dead included a father and his 1-year-old daughter in the village of Mirovac, near the northern Kosovo town of Podujevo.

According to Yugoslav officials, 300 civilians have been killed and 3,000 injured during the bombing campaign. There was no way to independently verify the figures. Yugoslavia does not disclose military casualties.

Fighting between Yugoslav forces and Kosovo rebels spilled over into Albania on Sunday when about 10 mortar shells exploded near the border village of Kremica, according to Albania's information minister, Musa Ulqini.

sider is coordinating assistance directly to displaced civilians in Kosovo.

Tomorrow Albright will try to mend fences with Russia, which has denounced the NATO bombardment of Yugoslavia, now nearing the end of a third week.

Russian President Boris Yeltsin on Friday warned that if NATO sent ground troops to Kosovo to "make it their protectorate, we cannot allow this."

Albright, downplaying the disagreement, said "there is a possibility" that Russia, one of the six nations behind the rejected Kosovo peace plan, could be "re-engaged" in trying to formulate a new settlement. But, Albright said, the Russians "clearly... are troubled" by the NATO attacks on the Serbs.

"This is an issue that has to be worked and worked," said Albright, who was to meet in Oslo, Norway, with Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov.

Albright said the United States expected Russia to adhere to the international arms embargo against Yugoslavia and not take "counterproductive" actions.

The Rambouillet accords call for the withdrawal of Serb troops, paramilitary and police units. A total of 5,000 troops could remain — 2,500 along the border, thereby assuring Kosovo remained part of Serbia, and 2,500 police who could remain for one year. Some would be absorbed into a local police force.

Asked if these terms still applied, Albright said "there has to be reconsideration. Lots of parts of Rambouillet have been overtaken by events. We have to be realistic and flexible."

The accords would give the ethnic Albanians self-rule but not independence.

transition program would involve elections or an eventual transfer to civilian rule. Earlier, Bare's flag-draped wood coffin was hoisted aloft and carried into a simple tomb in his personal compound by an honor guard of silver-helmeted firefighters.

Dozens of soldiers in red berets stood at attention, as top military leaders, government officials, opposition politicians and diplomats looked on in the withering 100-degree heat.

Members of the parachutist unit that Bare belonged to during his military career carried a bouquet of flowers, its petals fluttering to the ground.

The buzz of a generator providing electricity to the compound and a quick trumpet fanfare was nearly all that broke the sweltering silence.

Among the military brass conspicuously absent was Wanke, although dozens of his colleagues were in attendance.

Despite widespread knowledge of Bare's assassination, state radio continued to insist that he died in an "unfortunate accident."

Witnesses and diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Presidential Guard members repeatedly shot Bare with a truck-mounted large-caliber machine gun as he crossed the tarmac at Niamey's airport Friday to board a helicopter. Other soldiers then also opened fire on him and his personal bodyguards, who quickly moved to protect him.

The head of his bodyguard unit was shot dead when he tried to return fire. Local journalists said at least three soldiers and one civilian were killed and a half-dozen people wounded.

Diplomats and journalists noted that the military's smooth takeover of Niamey's streets after the shooting appeared to indicate the turnover had support among soldiers.

Hours after Bare's killing, Prime Minister Ibrahim Assane Mayaki disbanded the National Assembly — which is dominated by members of Bare's party — and temporarily suspended all political parties. Some legislators resisted the move — noting the constitution names the assembly's president as successor if the president dies. Yet the military appeared to have firm control over the country. Borders and airports quickly reopened and phone lines switched back on after they were severed on Friday.

Bare was not a popular figure. He seized power in an army coup three years ago from Niger's first democratically elected government.

He faced down repeated military mutinies and protests by students and civil servants, and earned opposition wrath by imprisoning some of their leaders. Lucrative government jobs were doled out to Bare's close relatives while soldiers went months without being paid.

His death followed a week of political tension. The opposition had called for his resignation, accusing his government of orchestrating attacks against polling workers tallying results from February's regional and municipal elections.

Asian Night mixes fashion and culture

"Lights...soundcheck..." The hustle and bustle of the opening night for the 16th Annual Asian Night was bubbling and the nervousness and tension could be cut with a knife.

Last minute hugs and good luck wishes, redirecting, headsets and microphone checks were mixed with technical and talent people scurrying about the converted Campus Center auditorium last Friday night.

Asian night was a celebration of uniqueness through liberation, history and fashion. A Chinese lucky lion dance kicked off the evening with a blessing. Traditionally, the lion dance symbolizes luck through red colors and wealth through the fabrics of pearls and silks. In ancient times, an offering of lettuce was given to the lion, a respected animal in China, so that his contentment would give a blessing to the function or holiday.

A traditional fashion show displayed models in clothes from Vietnam, Korea, Cambodia, India, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Pakistan and Japan. Music, hairstyles, makeup and props including wooden umbrellas, fans and hats accentuated the ethnic clothing.

According to Asian Night Producer, Kristina Tolentino students from the Asian community volunteered and worked on the show as early as February and the hard work showed.

Talents including dance, poetry and song illustrated the varying cultures of Asian countries. The feature of the evening was the dance performance, Chaiyya-Chaiyya by Ann Geeverghese and Nita Trivedi. Decked out in fire-red satin jumpers, their energy and clear dancing ability lit up the room by mixing traditional Bharatnatyam and hip hop to the tune of a popular Indian film soundtrack.

The modern fashion show, sponsored by eight local clothing stores, was well choreographed and professional. The stylish and retro make-up of some models was designed by ISA Cosmetics, a business comprised of UMass students. Most pleasing of all, was the realistically shaped models that wore clothes from elaborate saris and simple kimonos to grunge and retro ensembles with grace and beauty.

"We see images of beauty on the runways of New York and Milan in advertising and media, there is always one standard and a lack of Asian American beauty. This gives Asian Americans a chance to create their standard of beauty and representation that is rarely seen," Tolentino said.

Asian Night's traditional and modern fashion shows, along with modern dance and songs were rammed up well in a poetic interpretation of Heang Ly. "It is no longer just a black and white picture, it never was. Reality comprises of more. Time to progress and look at reality with color."

Save the psychos

There are way too many psychos around. I'm not saying that to offend the psychos — heavens, no! In fact, I, uh, like psychos very much and think that plotting elaborate mail-bombing webs is a great and productive thing to do. I just think that you can't have too much of a good thing. Go figure.

Phew. I'm still alive.

Now, it would be cruel and unusual for me to order the exportation of the lovable lunatics running rampant around the country. Hell, who's going to keep the population in check?

Seth Koenig

We have to keep them here, but give them something constructive to do so that they don't start stalking Collegian columnists. There has to be an elaborate system set up that curbs the devastation that these people can cause, while still keeping them merry and jovial.

Luckily for you, I have an idea — no, make that all sorts of ideas. Now you're really lucky!

> "We should employ all sorts of psychos at the brand new "Wacko World"!"

1.) Create a psychotic theme park.

We should employ all sorts of mentally disturbed individuals at the brand new "Wacko World"! In the exotic perimeter of San Quentin, tourists will walk through a haunted house perforated with daggers, zip down a 30-foot water slide covered in blood, and get launched off into the Pacific Ocean from the mile-high, half-finished roller coaster known as "Charlie's Challenge."

2.) Have them drive buses.

Apparently, somebody already thought of this. A fellow writer Paul, and I were alone with the bus driver on a commercial bus in Syracuse, N.Y., when, out of nowhere, the driver turns to us and says, "You're lucky I'm not president. You'd all be in the military. Everybody would do a year's worth of service after high school or college. It only takes a year to learn how to kill, you know — yep, 365 days is all. Germany does it, why can't we?"

A year to learn how to kill? Sure, it's one of those things that everybody's got to learn at some time or another during their lives. It's right up there with cursive writing and toilet training. But what I don't understand is why we should wait until after high school or college. Why not make it like a foreign language and start working on turning our youth into mindless murderers in middle school? Hell, then by the time they reach the university level, the United States will be feared worldwide as "The country of death." Swell idea.

Okay, so the psychos are driving buses already. Damn it. Beaten to the punch.

3.) Let them into professional wrestling.

Again, I think this has been done already, but let me tell you why it's a good idea.

Nobody will be able to decipher between actors like "The Undertaker" and legitimate maniacs like "The Unabomber." For all average fans know, it's just a block-buster matchup. By the time this plan has had a chance to fully play out, all the old wrestlers would be phased out and the lunatics would be phased in. Away with the blood capsules and the padding on the turnbuckles. Make way for the real thing, baby!

Normal people wouldn't do it, but psychos? They're perfect.

4.) Start them writing for college newspapers.

Where better for the crazies to get their tweaked manifestos out into the open than through college newspapers? It's a great form of release, and they might even find people they can relate to — or at least think they relate to. Who knows what kind of a diluted world those weirdos live in?

Well, I've got to go wrap up some volatile chemicals for some mid-week mass destruction. Adios!

Enemy of the state?

Will Smith's new thriller presents us with a chillingly plausible scenario about a technology–driven invasion of private lives. But its more profound message captured my imagination. It only takes a small coterie, motivated by desires other than public service, to hijack the authority bestowed upon them by the people and use it ruthlessly to bring traumatic and long–lasting changes to ordinary, otherwise happy, lives. What if I were to tell you that similar episodes on this campus may have occurred?

Some of us might be blithely unaware of a corporate entity amidst us. It is the mini–state of housing. With a multi–million dollar budget and a unique corporate culture, it derives little from the academic culture of the rest of the University. Some of us might characterize it as a quasi– fiefdom; where flattery, slime and intrigue are desired skills. One important function of the state of housing is the hiring and firing of the staff that is entrusted, literally, with the lives of the thousands of residents.

Most of the resident staff have access to the personal living space of the resident students. How responsibly they use their privileged positions has important bearing on the well–being of the residents. The Residence Life system hires residence directors (RDs), assistant resident directors (ARDs) and resident assistants (RAs) each year to replace graduating students. RDs are often professional career slots for qualified persons hired from the graduate students on campus or externally. RAs are hired from undergraduates by an appointed committee.

The ARD position is key in the system. To replace graduating ARDs, housing starts with an elaborate process of preliminary selections followed by an extensive sequence of exhaustive, as well as exhausting, interviews by a selection committee. All this is recorded into the personal dossier on the candidate. After a careful "sifting," the successful few are placed in a pool. This pool is designated by the academic year for which the placements are intended. So it appears that for one academic year, creation of one pool has been the usual practice and policy. As the year wears on, candidates are picked from this pool for the openings that emerge year round.

How a candidate from the pool is awarded a position, or who executes it, is an intriguing affair. Since the candidates are not regularly and formally informed of the openings unless they are the lucky ones, the veil of secrecy lends to the potential for abuse. Perhaps it makes the entrant thankful and "respectful" to the executing authority in the system.

Last summer saw the unfolding of a bizarre cascade of events tied to housing practices. The 1998–99 ARD pool comprised a dozen–odd candidates. The ephemeral affair stagnated when a non–white doctoral student got embroiled in a controversy with the executive authority over his assignment to a particular position. Maybe other favorite candidates coveted that "choice" position. The resultant uproar prompted the University hierarchy to intervene. As a result, two people were hired for the "choice" position. Someone in Housing was not pleased. This had upset their dictatorship.

> "Some of us might be blithely unaware of a corporate entity amidst us. It is the mini–state of Housing."
> Syed Bokhari

What happened next? You have guessed it. They immediately found a scapegoat in the shape of a candidate remaining in the pool. He belonged to the same non–white ethnicity as the previous doctoral candidate. He was caught in Housing's crossfire. He became the next "Enemy of the State." A splendid scheme to weed him out of the system was spun.

Since this ethnic guy knew little about the goings–on in Housing, he was blithely unaware. He had high hopes for the coming semester. He had made plans. He had been told he had done well in the interviews and it was documented in the dossier. However, on his next visit to the Housing office, he encountered his first taste of senseless prejudice.

His inquiry about future openings was met with a cold, curt and circumspect argument. He was disturbed but hopeful. He believed in the system and had confidence in himself. But by the end of the summer, he found himself alone in the pool. Most candidates were hired in preference to this ethnic guy. He was shaken but still hopeful. Everyone "in the know" told him that during the rest of the year his chances of getting an ARD position were quite good. So he waited.

His wait was shattered with a letter announcing premature closure of the pool — something that had never happened before. He stood no chance against the powerful executive authority in Housing — mission accomplished. He was told that no more openings were anticipated in the current year. Yet, an opening did arise soon afterwards. His saga of being splendidly stonewalled is continuing at present. Stay tuned for more details.

Why is it that Housing is so high on the student dissatisfaction scale? While students are getting shot or raped, Housing is busy playing one group of students against another. Such lapses of professionalism are a result of perennial graduate students, mostly from one specific department, monopolizing the key management positions in Housing. Presently the "benign neglect" posture of higher authorities towards Housing is interpreted by Housing as a blanket endorsement of its shady practices.

Can we allow this to go on? This concerns the very lives of thousands of students. Should we expect the parents of these students to blindly continue to underwrite this bungling, mismanaged, multi–million dollar corporate organization? Before a big bang rocks the UMass bust we must retrieve Housing from its current state of affairs. Will Smith in my story is still waiting for a Gene Hackman.

~Letters to the Editor~

Safety on campus should be addressed

[Editor's note: This letter was originally addressed and sent to Chancellor David K. Scott.]

To the editor:

We are writing in response to the two motor vehicle accidents that resulted in the deaths of Kerry Hines and more recently, Allison Lustig, that have occurred this academic year. We feel strongly that the UMass administration and the Summit on Safety committee have not implemented adequate safety measures since Ms. Hines' death, which allowed for a second tragedy to occur on March 11; the death of Ms. Lustig. This is not only a student issue, but also a liability to the University.

We are therefore asking for immediate action to be taken on this campus—a lot of them before another death occurs. Several suggestions for improving pedestrian safety include the following:

- Repaint all crosswalks with safety color
- Campus–wide speed limit and enforcement by campus police
- Pedestrian crossing lights and caution signs at all major crosswalks on campus
- State law crosswalk signs on center line of major crosswalks
- Speed bumps on high traffic roads such as Commonwealth Avenue
- Education of on–campus and off–campus students about crosswalk and vehicle safety

Although these suggestions may seem difficult to enforce with the number of students that use the crosswalks on campus, without education and enforcement, unnecessary tragedies will continue to occur each semester. If the crosswalk law cannot be enforced, consideration should be made towards banning the crosswalk law.

Undergraduate and graduate students of all ages come to UMass for an education and should not feel their safety is compromised while crossing a campus crosswalk.

We are asking for immediate implementation of new strategies and notification of the changes to be made on campus roads.

Rebecca L. Ryan teaching assistant, Community Health 160

Put a plug in it

There are many stupid things happening on this campus. Frisbee, for one thing, and swing dancing, for another. Bar none, however, the stupidest thing on campus is the endless wave of protesting.

I was really unprepared for protesting when I came here. At home the only viable form of protest was the "Speak Out!" section of the local newspaper, where you could call a number and leave a message on a machine so the paper could print it for all to see. The "Speak Out!" column consisted mainly (if not entirely) of old people complaining about the quality or total lack of toilet paper in public restrooms and town selectmen under assumed names calling each other ethnic slurs.

Rob Schultz

The temper tantrums are taken a great deal farther here, though (it's not for nothing that 'the old man' calls UMass "The City of Children"). Here they are full–scale, semi– organized, forceful, and above all, loud. Yep, you can hear a bona–fide UMass protest clear across in Belchertown, should you have the misfortune to be in Belchertown at the time.

The noise is just one of the key aspects that make the protests, as previously indicated, very, very stupid. It was no less a man than the immortal Dave Barry who wrote "The main accomplishment of almost all organized protests is to annoy people who are not in them."

This is the truest thing ever written and I include all religious texts in that statement.

For instance, when some people were protesting U.S. sanctions against Iraq on the Student Union steps (whether they were for or against the sanctions I never did figure out), I did not see any U.S. officials in suits sitting around changing policy or Iraqi children being given free books or Air Jordans. What I did see was myself having to fight through a yelling, sign–waving, rather unpleasant–smelling crowd of unfriendly strangers just so I could go cash a check and pay off my dealer.

Uh, actually, forget that last part.

That's just the thing about all these protests. They never seem to bother the people they are meant to, just random passersby who have nothing to do with it. Take the whole admissions issue. Now, my personal opinion on this critical and malice–producing issue happens to be exactly the same as yours, especially if you are bigger than me, but that doesn't have anything to do with what went down at Whitmore last week.

You blocked off all the doors! You formed a "human wall" around key areas! You yelled a lot and carried signs! What did this accomplish? Were the people inside Whitmore crying. broken souls who would have given anything for you to relent and cease your reign of terror?

> "You blocked off all the doors! You formed a "human wall" around key areas! You yelled a lot and carried signs! What did this accomplish?"

No, you stupid morons, what happened was that the people working there all of a sudden had no pesky customers to deal with so they could take an extra break and have some jumbo hot dogs from the snack bar. The oppressors were inside, shoeless and laughing, playing blackjack and lighting cigars with students' vital documents while you were outside getting a sunburn and sweating like Boss Hawg on the "Dukes of Hazard."

Who was actually affected by this outpouring of childishness and ill will? Students who had errands to run in Whitmore and were all of a sudden unable to do so. Who knows? Maybe some deserving minority student absolutely had to pay a bill that day but was unable to because you were "making a statement" to Chancellor Scott, who was off somewhere else doing whatever it is he does, without noticing. Maybe you caused the percentage of minority students to decrease! I bet you feel bad now.

To sum it all up: write letters, hold private meetings, bribe officials, do whatever it is you need to do in order to accomplish whatever it is that you want, but stop clogging up my campus with your meaningless garbage. And to whoever it is that goes right under my window every Saturday night to protest the fact that he's out of alcohol, I suggest you stop, or I'm going to start dropping things on you.

Mumia march in Philly; BSU to send nine buses

By Edgar A. Barros
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, April 24 a "March for Mumia" will take place. The march is to raise support for death row inmate, Mumia Abu–Jamal. Jamal, who is a former Black Panther Party member, a journalist and an activist in the Civil Rights Movement, is on death row for the murder of a Philadelphia police officer.

Jamal was found guilty of murdering the police officer by the Philadelphia state court system. Advocates of Jamal hope to gain another trial for the death row inmate, only this time in the Supreme Court.

A date for Jamal's execution has not yet been determined.

Marchers are expected from all over the United States. In the Five–College area, the University of Massachusetts Black Student Union is organizing and sponsoring nine charter buses for the trip to Philadelphia. All bus tickets have been sold out.

"The tickets went fast. People of all backgrounds are leaving here to support Mumia," said Black Student Union president Jeff Belizaire.

According to Belizaire, the Rev. Iesse Jackson and Sister Souljah are scheduled to speak at the March.

According to Belizaire and other Jamal activists, there are many inconsistencies with the police's story.

"The gun Mumia owned does not hold the same caliber bullets founds inside the police officer's body. There were also several witnesses who were not allowed to testify for various reasons. There was also a third person in Mumia's car who was mysteriously killed three days after the death of the police officer," Belizaire said.

There have been some misconceptions as to what the purpose of the march actually is. Some have been led to believe that it is for the immediate release of Jamal.

"The march is to demand a new, unbiased trial for Mumia. He was framed by the police for the murder and he was not given a fair and just trial. All we are asking for is that justice is served," Belizaire said.

Jamal, who has been incarcerated for 19 years, still pleads innocent to the charges brought against him and many of his supporters believe him.

"I believe 100 percent that Mumia is innocent. He was framed by racist cops. I am not saying that all cops are guilty, but the ones who framed him are," said UMass sophmore undeclared major in the school of management, Hydn Vales.

> "I believe 100 percent that Mumia is innocent. He was framed by racist cops. I am not saying that all cops are guilty, but the ones who framed him are."
> – UMass sophmore finance major Hydn Vales.

Others such as Belizaire, state that this is bigger than just Mumia Abu–Jamal.

"This is really a stand against the injustices which still exist here in the great Unites States of America," Belizaire said.

"If he gets executed, it would be the equivalent of Malcolm or Martin getting shot. Mumia is a leader who has the ability to galvanize people of color against this racist, right–wing government."

Many UMass students have bought bus tickets to make the journey from Amherst to Philadelphia.

"On one hand we are going down to show support. It's complicated but the point is the precedence it sets to the judicial system. It's bigger than Mumia. It sets a precedent so that if anyone of us ends up in a courtroom we'll actually get the rights the constitution guaranteies us," said Nikon K. Hodjat, a junior biology major.

For UMass freshman pre–nursing major, Melissa Straughn, it is an exposure of the injustices which are known by many outside the United States.

"I want people to see how corrupt the U.S. justice system is. Mumia is a living victim of the system. I come from another country and I know that people outside the U.S. often do not know the truth. The land of the free sounds good, but in reality, they are very prejudice against people of color," Straughn said.

Others are hopeful that all evidence will be presented in a new trial.

"I heard about Mumia's story and [it] doesn't seem that everything adds up. I think he was convicted of a murder he didn't commit. Hopefully the evidence that wasn't able to be brought up previously will be presented in a new trial, so as to shed light upon his unfortunate situation," said UMass junior marketing major, Cornelius Harris.

Supporters also feel that this is not only for Jamal, but for all those that have suffered against injustice.

"After hearing the case about Mumia, I felt that the information didn't add up. It's not just for Mumia. It's for all the political prisoners now and before who have gone through what Mumia has experienced," said UMass freshman economic and social thought and political economy major Malcolm Backwith.

In further support of Jamal, the Black Student Union has invited Massachusetts Institute of Technology bio–chemistry professor Linda Jordan to speak on issues concerning black America — including the Mumia Abu–Jamal issue. She will be at the New Africa House library Thursday at 7 p.m.

BH BELIZAIRE

Dr. Linda Jordan will speak at New Africa House this Thursday at 7 p.m. She will address issues facing blacks in mainstream America.

Black Affairs is always looking for writers, if you're interested please come down to the Collegian and talk to Edgar Barros.

Weekend features three cultural events

By Lanell James
Collegian Staff

Starting Friday April 9, and continuing until Saturday April 10, a celebration of culture, history and talent vibrant for two days straight. Masses of students, parents and people from the local communities gathered under the roofs of the University of Massachusetts Campus Center and the Student Union to move to music, eat together, and most importantly, learn about each other and themselves.

"For me it was very enlightening and educational. I enjoyed myself," said Rahilya Napoli, a sophomore nursing major who attended all three events.

Friday was the 16th Annual Asian Night, held by the Asian American Student Association (AASA), which featured honored guest speaker Yuri Kochiyama. Kochiyama commented on social activism and the importance of unity in the community, especially the Asian community. She wrapped up her speech by congratulating the AASA and all the people who came out to support the event.

"She was excellent. She is a powerful advocate in the struggle for positive race relations," said Kristina Tolentino, Asian Night production manager.

> "The crowd was amazing and everyone, including experts and novices, got onto the dance floor and enjoyed themselves."
> – Salandra Johnson, sophomore communication disorders major.

Over the course of the evening over 2,500 people gathered to the free program to watch the fashion show and performances. The fashion show showcased clothing from Wilson's to Finishline and featured Amherst clothing store, D'Arby's. Many also danced the night away at the dance party, and enjoyed the dinner reception after the program.

"Asian night was successful in that it was able to represent a very diverse Asian community, ranging from Indian to Japanese. It was a special time where we could stick to our roots and illustrate our songs, dress, languages, theatre and fashion. I was completely energized and proud to be a part of the Asian American community," said Tolentino.

Also on Friday night, the Student Union Ballroom hosted the third annual Sabor Latino '99. Starting at 6 p.m., the event featured keynote speaker Leandro Soto.

There was also a fashion and talent showcase that promoted poetry and other artistic performances. The night ended everyone on the dance floor moving to the different beats of Latino music: salsa, cumbia, merengue and bachata.

"The crowd was amazing and everyone, including experts and novices, got onto the dance floor and enjoyed themselves," said Salandra Johnson, a sophomore communication disorders major.

On Saturday, the eighth annual Haitian Culture Night was held in the Student Union Ballroom; following the theme of "Ayiti, cherie mwen", translated "Haiti, my love." The event celebrated the beauty, history, and the culture of the island.

The night started with opening remarks by Haitian American Student Association President Esperance Etienne. He welcomed and urged everyone to continue to promote and practice the heritage and culture of Haiti.

"The night was a tremendous success and I hope others feel the same," Etienne said.

A short video was shown to illustrate the history and culture of Haiti, especially the arts and the craftsmanship. Expressing the beauty and necessity of art, Blondel Josef, acclaimed Haitian artist, spoke. He spoke about how art kept him from feeling homesick when he came to America. He said art does not need to be explained if you let the art speak to you. Lastly, he spoke of embracing voodoo and representing it in his artwork.

"The dance performances by "Negresse Kreyol' were unbelievable," Etienne said.

The crowd felt the same way when they gave Negresse Kreyol a standing ovation for their finale.

The dance floor was then opened and people were welcomed to dance to the traditional Haitian music as well as Latino, Cape Verdean, reggae and rap/R&B.

Collectively these events demonstrated the diversity, organization and unity of people of color in the Five–College Area.

"Everyone learned a lot because of these cultural nights. It was one of the best weekends at the University of Massachusetts," said junior Ricardo Rodriguez.

Music keeps the Puerto Rican alive

The island of Puerto Rico is neither a state nor is it an independent territory of the United States. The U.S. acquired Puerto Rico as a commonwealth. U.S. corporations invested in Puerto Rico attempting to keep the island in line 'politically.' The Island of Puerto Rico and Cuba grew up as holiday resorts and gambling centers owned and enjoyed by Americans. Tax free businesses paying low wages to workers make a haven for multi–national corporations.

Felipe Luciano, a 1960s activist in the Puerto Rican community of the South Bronx strongly believes, "music keeps the Puerto Rican alive."

Puerto Ricans arriving to the South Bronx were thrown into poverty. The competitive and prejudiced job market forced most of them into the service industry. Puerto Ricans had to assimilate to the American capitalist culture so they would not fall between the cracks of poverty. As a result, their culture was non–existent and less significant to American society, forcing them into a state of cultural amnesia.

The working class community remained in the lowest economic tier of wealth.

"The identity of the Puerto Rican is rooted in the support of the closeness within the family" but urbanization is quickly changing that. Immigrants face language barriers that give way to many prejudice attitudes. These barriers are attributed to one's character or ethnicity. They refused to face and accept second–class citizenry due to the lack of intellectual capacity to adjust, Luciano said.

Luciano believes it is the responsibility of every Puerto Rican, educated or not, to remove the "veil" of stereotypes so that we may see our own beauty.

He felt the most important contribution to the consciousness of the community was fighting against the government system — capitalism. Activism changed their position of inferiority from victims, to positions of control. It would empower them to break the shackles of oppression and inspire an erectness of character.

> Viviana De Jesus

Puerto Ricans are the largest part of the Latino community yet census takers continue to disseminate untruths about our totality. They create an illusion of a smaller population and plant seeds of powerlessness and inferiority. The 60s movement addressed concerns regarding the misinformed history of Latin culture in the New York City Public School System. Their method is not to teach us our own culture, language, music or history. This method is used to put Puerto Rican children's consciousness into a narcosis. Eddie Palmieri, a salsa artist and activist in the music industry feels the need to address the children about their African roots through salsa music.

The 60s was a "macho" dominated genre ruled by the mentality that women "couldn't sing," this barrier was broken by Celia Cruz, a Cuban salsa composer and singer. She is a salsa Queen and a legend in the community. In the 60s her role as a female singer was inspirational and spoke of the strength women of color possess. Cruz's music embodies the African rhythms and roots of salsa.

Luciano explains how American entrepreneurs took hold of the salsa industry and manipulated the music to their benefit. Jerry Masucchi, the power behind Fania Records, combined the commercial aspects of bland lyrics and musical aspects of African, Caribbean rhythm to create a smooth sounding effect. Insidiously the music takes on a defusing, pacifist, status quo role. Distracting people away from the shit encrusted walls, that they have to stare at everyday. The smooth sounds of commercial salsa are too far removed from the reality of the communities.

Ruben Blades composed and songs whose lyrics rebelled against the violence of fascism. His uncompromising, political lyrics speak of political prisoners who fought against the "sadness" of men deprived of their liberty. His lyrics brought first dimensional reality to our music.

Our religion is also linked with African rhythm. Spaniards forced the African and indigenous people on the island to worship Christian saints and Christianity but they resisted by converting these saints to Santeria. The religion of the African slave. In Puerto Rico this symbol is used as their own African God. Air, Sea and Wind are symbolic images of West African religion. Salsa musicians play through a language of rhythm.

Luciano asserts, "our music survives because it is the consciousness of our people."

In the South Bronx, New York City's poorest district, children live with a sense of total worthlessness. The Puerto Rican refuses to be swallowed by this feeling and refuses to let the slums digest their rich culture; living in the belly of the beast and dancing to the rhythmic beats of a different drum.

A stale, dark SubUrbia

By Bryan McAllister

SUBURBIA
Bowker Auditorium
April 10

One watches Eric Bogosian's lengthy SubUrbia with a mixture of fascination and frustration. On one hand, we as college students, can easily relate to the subject matter. On the other, that subject matter is often cynical, sad and hopeless. What is said does not digest easily, especially since Bogosian is talking directly to us — "Generation X" that awful and now cheesy term for '90s youth.

The play was made into a movie, but the preachy dialogue and stilted action work better on the stage, where that loud and clear message is better delivered. The stage this time was Bowker Auditorium, where the University of Massachusetts Theatre Guild presented SubUrbia over the weekend with a cast of nine actors whose greatest assets were pure bravery, pure bravery, and pure bravery.

It takes courage, for instance, to be on stage for nearly two hours with only one set — a convenience store — and dialogue to help you. You also need to be required to play hockey on rollerblades, get in fights, throw up, thrust yourself, swear incessantly, drink beer cans and in one case, go completely nude.

It's no wonder, then, that the nine member cast and director of SubUrbia had a little trouble with the things that matter most — acting, pacing, character consistency. The play was marked by inconsistency, powerful and touching in some scenes, and quite stale in others. While some criticism in this case should go to the play itself, most of the actors in SubUrbia looked constrained, as if they didn't totally know what they were saying or doing.

SubUrbia has a carefully crafted non-story. In the suburban town of Burbville, seven friends spend their days hanging out at the local convenience store. They include people like Jeff, Rob Killeen, a sardonic, opinionated college drop-out, who wants to change the world, but isn't sure how; his friend Tim (Kevin Kelliher), a racist, ultra- cynical ex-army boy, who wants to perfect his alcoholism; Buff (Michael Chiavaroli), the class clown with an overpowered pleasure drive.

These early scenes are slow but intriguing; director Paul Lanoch elle carefully builds the characters and weaves the action around the convenience store. But after such hesitation, one would expect SubUrbia to enter a rhythm where every piece of dialogue, character motivation, and plot twist would make sense. And by the tragic finale, one would expect to be moved.

But very often, this SubUrbia just lumbered on, like the characters themselves, making bold statements but without the conviction to back them up.

These seven friends are already jaded when Pony (Greg Hoyt), an old friend and somewhat of a dork in high school, comes back to hang-out. He arrives in a limo and seems to represent everything good about the American Dream, until he too confesses that he was merely lucky, not to mention friendless and lonely.

Killeen and Kelliher, as Jeff and Tim, were inconsistent: both have obvious talent, but struggled to make their characters multidimensional, often delivering their lines in the same tone.

The three standouts in the cast were Bovard, Chiavaroli, and Seigel. Bovard brought a colorful but sad aspect to the dreamer-feminist role, and Chiavaroli was consistently hilarious as Buff; he's a marvelous physical actor with a contagious voice and laugh. Seigel, as the store owner, was a solid voice of reason, avoiding the stereotypes of playing a Pakistani convenience store owner.

SubUrbia doesn't quite leave a good feeling in your stomach — it presents problems with no easy answers. But as the artists communicating these problems, the Theatre Guild perhaps bit off a bit more than they could chew.

Pony (Greg Hoyt) and Sooze (Lindsey Boivard) bond in the Theatre Guild's production of SubUrbia.

Ani waxes poetical and political

Folk rocker Ani DiFranco was in top form at the Mullins Center Friday night.

ANI DIFRANCO
Mullins Center
April 9

There is nothing more inherently natural and right than a girl and her guitar. Especially when that girl packs a walloping artillery of vocal fireworks, lyrical dynamite, and explosive guitar rifts. Ani DiFranco gave one of her characteristically impassioned performances Friday night at the William D. Mullins Center.

She started off her set list with a new song "Virtue," but the evening really got started with the second song, "Gravel," a great showcase of DiFranco's fiery guitar playing. As DiFranco sang, "I'm bigger than everything that came before me," you believed, indeed she is, and everything after too.

Next, DiFranco talked about a song she recently wrote called "Election Day" about the murdering of abortion clinic doctors in her hometown of Buffalo N.Y. and in Birmingham, Ala. She recently performed in a clinic benefit in Alabama and talked about the song as a "dialogue between her hometown of Buffalo and Birmingham."

The song was a little bit of a surprise to the audience who hadn't heard DiFranco's political musings in quite some time. But the song, which likened the clinic murders with the civil rights movement and Martin Luther King Jr. sent the crowd into an appreciative silence.

"Shy," DiFranco's greatest relationship song, brought the fans to their feet. She sings of a "no-strings attached" relationship — "the sheets are twisted and damp/the heat is so great/and I swear I can feel the mattress sinking underneath your weight/sleep is like a fever/ and I'm glad when it ends/ the road flows like a river/it pulls me around every bend."

This is probably also one of DiFranco's concert staples because it highlights her incredible back-up band, complete with a very talented new drummer Terrence Hodge, who solidified the song into something gut-wrenching and delicious.

DiFranco, perhaps in keeping in tune with what the audience wanted, didn't sing many songs of her newest album Up,Up,Up,Up,Up,Up, which has received lackluster reviews. A standout however from that album was "My Country Tis' of Thee," a slow tune that she performed sublimely.

An Ani DiFranco concert is nothing without her irreverent and adolescent humor, and this one had its share. But at one serious moment, DiFranco told the audience she had finally found joy and happiness in her life; joy and happiness that she dispenses eagerly to her listeners as well.

Everlast's charm is not everlasting

EVERLAST
Student Union Ballroom
April 8

Without the expected shamrocks or shenanigans, Everlast failed to bring the house down last Thursday night at the Student Union Ballroom.

The performance was marred by an underlying battle between Everlast and his audience for mutual approval. The two entities never got on the same page, resulting in a vastly disappointing evening.

Everlast, really Erick Schrody and former front man for the House of Pain, took the stage donned in a yellow and blue University of California basketball jersey, and hat to represent his native Golden State.

The clashing backdrop of an American flag with a makeshift assemblance of a junkyard in front of it were quite symbolic of the inconsistency of Schrody's performance.

Only hardcore fans of Everlast, of which there seemed to be few on hand, were even aware that he would be accompanied by a bassist, guitarist, drummer, and keyboardist, and that his days of jumping around were virtually over.

After the spinning of "The White Boy is Back" by DJ Truly Odd, Everlast exclaimed that everyone was in for his newfound brand of "bee-boy, country, hip-hop, blues, not to be confused with a House of Pain song."

Schrody opened his one-hour and five minute set with "No Doubt" off his former group's third album; Truth Crushed to Earth Shall Rise Again.

That little known pick did little to endear Schrody to his supposed followers, who can best be described as "lifeless" throughout his first eight selections.

Even an early injection of "Ends," the current radio smash off of Whitey Ford Sings the Blues, had virtually no effect on the now soporific gathering.

After repeated requests for some of the House of Pain's most recognized endeavors, Schrody almost mockingly infused "Legend", a single released between the group's second and third albums.

Despite the prolonged drought, Everlast finished strong with a one-two-three punch beginning with "Dollar Bill" without Brand Nubian's Sadat X who appears on the Whitey Ford.. album version.

By the time he reached his peak with the hardened version of that cut, fortified with extra bass, Schrody was already fed up with the crowd just as they began to warm up to him. He ranted that the security on hand was responding more favorably than the audience and it saddened him profusely.

Nonetheless, Schrody desperately appeased them with a remix of "Jump Around", a club anthem in the early 1990s, which only made everyone wonder why he broke up House of Pain in the first place.

His tardy explanation that certain group favorites would best be left for when former backup vocalist Danny Boy O'Connor rejoined him, left hope of a possible reunion down the line.

After an extended version of "What It's Like", the first single off of Whitey Ford..., Everlast and his entourage abruptly left the stage, and refused to answer the modest call for an encore.

Needless to say, Everlast will not be headlining the 1999 UMass Spring Concert.

Khaleel, a sextet out of Los Angeles turned in an uplifting performance to commence the evening, with selections off the group's latest album People Watching.

Lead vocalist Khaleel, formerly known as "Bronx Style Bob," exhibited the dually poetic and spiritual tone that Everlast is apparently now striving to match.

On songs such as "No Mercy," a plea for social tolerance, and "Daddy's Little Girl," dedicated to his daughter, Khaleel appeared to have lost even himself in the overwhelming emotions entrapped in the music.

Several times he closed his eyes, and spun around what seemed aimlessly in search of capturing the essence of his messages with every hinging chord.

He concluded his passionate 45-minute set with "Like A Woman," intended to glorify all that females have to offer, which left the audience knowing that they had seen at least one stellar performance for their troubles.

UM Minutewomen's tennis downs Fairfield

By Matt O'Neill
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team extended its winning streak to three In a row with a victory over Fairfield last Thursday.

The Minutewomen dominated the Stags from beginning to end. The team won all the singles matches in the abbreviated contest. There was no doubles action due to Fairfield's coach calling it after the singles because of wind.
